The 1988-89 face-lift featured a whole new cast of characters. First-year head coach John Calipari replaced Ron Gerlufsen and besides bringing his recruiting talents to campus, he pledged an up-tempo and more exciting brand of basketball. The all-time UMass scoring leader's void was filled by freshman Jim McCoy who became the all-time freshman scoring leader.

There were other problems for the Minutemen as well. They lacked a real big man.

They lacked real depth.

At times, they lacked intensity.

But this is not a eulogy. Most basketball "experts" picked UMass to finish in the cellar, dead last in the conference — it finished eighth. After the loss of Chase and Brown, plenty of folks figured that the Minutemen had seen their last 'W' but UMass hung in it and managed five more wins (including a 16-point thrashing of Rutgers — one of the teams competing for the Atlantic 10 conference championship tomorrow night at New Brunswick, NJ).

One thing is for sure, this past season is over and all UMass can do is look to next year.

The Minutemen will be aided by this year's Atlantic 10 Freshman of the Year (just take my word for it), McCoy. Overshadowed by McCoy has been his co-freshman, Anton Brown. Brown had a great first semester

Jenifer poses plan for state universities

Proposes independence for Boston campus

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state's top higher education official balked yesterday at a plan to vastly expand the size and power of the University of Massachusetts and instead proposed diluting the university's power.

The chancellor of the state Board of Regents recommended yesterday separating the University of Massachusetts at Boston from the University of Massachusetts system and allowing the Dorchester campus to have its own president and board of trustees.

The proposal by Chancellor Franklyn Jenifer would also allow the University of Lowell and Southeastern Massachusetts University to remain independent and would merge the Worcester medical school with the university's Amherst campus.

Jenifer's plan was in sharp contrast to a proposal unveiled a half hour after the regents' morning meeting got under way.

A special commission recommended to the University of Massachusetts trustees that the University take over Lowell and SMU and consolidate power under a single president and board at Amherst. The newly constituted University would also control its budget, independent of the regents.

"I would argue," Jenifer said, "that the best administration is one that is locally based, with its own trustees and its own president who focus exclusively on the mission of that institution."

Jenifer said the Boston campus of the University is so different from the residential campus in its rural Amherst setting that they should be separate, autonomous institutions.

"I believe in a decentralized, more autonomous form of government, rather than a centralized form of government," Jenifer said.

The two recommendations essentially pit the trustees of the University of Massachusetts, who are responsible for a three-campus system and are seeking to expand the University's scope, against the regents, who are responsible for all 29 colleges and universities in the state higher education system.

"If it comes down to a power struggle, the regents have the power," said David Saxon, chairman of the Commission on the Future of the University of Massachusetts, which recommended the unified university system. On an issue that involves the regents, Saxon said, "I don't think the trustees have a great deal of power."

Paul Tsongas, chairman of the Board of Regents, praised the proposal submitted by Chancellor Franklyn Jenifer to maintain four independent state universities and merge the University of Massachusetts at Amherst with the University medical school in Worcester.

Tsongas, who formerly a member of the University of Lowell board of trustees, said the success of that school in establishing a statewide reputation for excellence in the sciences was a major reason behind Jenifer's recommendation.

But Tsongas warned against dismissing the proposal by the special commission to create one overarching university.

"There's a sentiment among some people in this room to ignore the commission but I think that would be a mistake," Tsongas said.

Trial period proposed for Tower

By DONNA CASSATA
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole, struggling to stave off rejection of John Tower's nomination as defense secretary, proposed yesterday night an extraordinary six-month trial confirmation period so senators could judge whether Tower lived up to his no-drinking pledge.

Senate Democratic Leader George Mitchell expressed "immediate serious concerns" over the proposal, but promised to consider it overnight.

Dole made his dramatic bid to salvage the nomination at the end of the fifth day of a draining Senate debate, and after conceding it would "take a miracle to win confirmation."

Under Dole's proposal, Tower would be confirmed, but would submit a letter of resignation to President Bush dated Oct. 1, 1989. Of Tower's performance were satisfactory, there "probably" would be no need to reconfirm him, Dole said. Otherwise, "he probably wouldn't be the nominee."

Dole said he offered his proposal after discussing it with Tower. It came as the Senate neared a climax in its bitter struggle over the nomination.

Lloyd Bentsen, of Texas became the third Democrat to endorse Tower's confirmation, but his speech was bracketed by declaration of opposition from Claiborne Pell of Rhode Island, Bennett Johnston of Louisiana, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Charles Robb of Virginia — Democrats who had been lobbied hard by the Bush administration as potential pro-Tower votes.

An Associated Press survey found 51 Democrats and Republican Sen. Larry Pressler of South Dakota either solidly opposed or leaning against confirmation with 41 Republicans and three Democrats either supporting or leaning in favor of the nomination.

Democrats hold a 55-45 edge in the Senate.

Dole made his extraordinary proposal to deal with Senate concerns over Tower's history of drinking. "I think we ought to give him a second chance that many of us have had," said Dole, who was seriously wounded during World War II but has risen to a position of power and prominence in the Senate.

"It gives this Senate a second opportunity. It addresses the concerns raised by the chairman and the majority leader and by others at the same time it gives President Bush his choice for secretary of defense," Dole said.

Earlier, Dole suggested Tower be permitted to come to the Senate and answer the allegations against him, but did not immediate press the issue when Mitchell objected.

There was little doubt that Dole's maneuverings were his final bid to save the nomination. Earlier, he conceded it would "take a miracle" to do so, and Johnston's speech seemed to deflate Republican hopes.

"In the nuclear age we can't afford to take a chance on the man who holds the future in his hands," Johnston said on the Senate floor.

Nuclear weapon proliferation a major worry

By SCOTT ROE
Collegian Correspondent

The potential disaster caused by the spread of nuclear weapon technology and the capacity to use that technology was the topic of a lecture given by Leonard Spector last night at Amherst College.

Lenoard Spector, who has been on the staff of the Carnegie Endowment for International peace since 1980, said the number of countries that have acquired nuclear weapon technology is on the rise. In the past decade countries such as Israel, Pakistan, South Africa, and India have gained nuclear technology.

Two other countries, Brazil and Argentina are also on their way to acquiring this technology, Spector said.

Most of these nations that have obtained nuclear technology deny that they have these weapon capabilites to avoid international criticism, Spector said.

"When you talk about nuclear weapons you are talking about weapons that can transform entire countries'

Entrepreneur offers advice

By MEREDITH CLELAND
Collegian Correspondent

"It's not what you're making when you're 22 that matters - it's what you're making when you're 30."

Success was the theme of John Katzman's 'We Score More' lecture last night in the Campus Center Auditorium. Katzman, a young entrepreneur and President of the Princeton Review, spoke on everything from decreasing test anxiety to starting your own business.

A 1981 graduate of Princeton University, Katzman started his own business in 1979 as founder of the Princeton Review, one of the premier national testing and review services for high school and undergraduate students.

"I looked around and realized that out of all the testing services, no one was really doing a good job. So, I got started designing a review to address flaws that I saw in other courses," he said.

Since it began, Katzman said his program has helped students nationwide on exams like the LSAT, the GRE, and the GMAT achieve higher test scores.

"With the average score on the LSAT being 30, we have a standard improvement of 9 or 10 points. On the GRE, we have about a 200 point increase. You can't knock the results," he said.

Besides strategies on testing, Katzman also discussed ways to improve your skills when interviewing for a job.

"If you're qualified and you want that interview, find a company and find a name of someone in that company. Send them a simple letter explaining why you like the company, a need you perceive in that company, and why you could help. You have no idea how powerful it is to receive a letter like that — believe me," Katzman said.

As for starting a business, Katzman advised the audience to pick a good industry and work with short-term goals.

"You have to start off slowly-don't look to hit a homerun right away," he said. "You must prepare yourself for lots of hard work."

Katzman also stressed the importance of public relations and advertising to any prospective entrepreneur: "It's essential that when you get out there, you get your name out there, too."

Shanty construction slows due to cold temperatures

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Freezing temperatures have prompted a slowdown in construction at "Cutback City," but its undaunted residents said yesterday the weather conditions are only a temporary setback.

The city, which was erected near the campus pond nearly two weeks ago in protest of state budget cuts against public higher education, consists of five crudely-built shacks, the frames of two others, two pup tents, and assorted furniture.

A lone member of Students for a Democratic University, the city's founding organization, hammered away yesterday at one of the shacks, creating a wall from lumber scraps and cardboard boxes.

Steve Longpre, a senior, said he hopes the shacks, which have remained unfinished since Friday, will be completed by the end of the week.

"You want to come here and do it all, but you just can't," Longpre said. "Once it gets a little bit nicer out, people can at least spend one night. That's enough."

"Come on down and grab a hammer," he said. "The budget cuts are affecting everybody. It seems that everybody who goes to school here could put a hand in."

The city's population has steadily increased to 20 people, and resident Diana Ditmore, who was one of 5 residents who joined 600 students Tuesday at the Statehouse in Boston to protest state budget cuts, estimated that at least 15 people actually remain in the shacks overnight.

The shack's one wall is graced with a poster thanking supporters, "sock donaters," the University for "fire extinguishers and smoke alarms," and the Science Fiction Club for "the comfy chair," a gray recliner outside of one shacks.

The students are also receiving support from local venders, including a donation Monday night of four calzones from Dan Haley, owner and manager of "D.P. Dough," a take-out service in Amherst.

Student joins trustee race

Promises to lobby for students

Student activist Rob Skelton has officially declared his candidacy for student trustee at the University of Massachusetts, promising to lobby actively for student issues.

Skelton, a journalism major and the former news producer for the Union Video Center, said in a written statement this week that, if elected, he would focus on budget cutbacks and solidarity among activist students.

"I'm going to lobby like hell for the students," he said, adding he plans to make his voice heard by the governor and state legislators.

"They say we're not sending a strong enough message," he said. "If anyone can get that message through, it's me."

Skelton said he is non-partisan candidate, and claimed to be the only trustee candidate to have spent a night at "Cutback City," a mock shantytown erected by the campus pond to protest budget cutbacks.

"I'm not in debt to the left or the right," he said. "Most student issues are non-partisan anyhow. You won't find conservatives attacking Cutback City, because the protest affects us all."

Senate filibusters again

Effort to change MassPIRG funding fails

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

A three-hour filibuster erupted last night during the Undergraduate Student Senate meeting, sparked by an attempt by conservative senators to modify MassPIRG's method of acquiring funds.

MassPIRG is a statewide organization of college and university students whose functions include helping students register to vote and lobbying legislators to work on environmental issues including industrial pollution, acid rain, and the depletion of the ozone layer.

The organization is funded by an optional $4 fee added to each students' tuition bill. The fee may be waived if students mark the appropriate box stating they do not wish to contribute to MassPIRG.

Every three years during student elections, including this year, MassPIRG places a referendum question on the ballot asking students if they want this method of funding to continue.

But, for conservative Sens. Brian Darling and W. Greg Rothman, this question was not enough. The pair helped the Students Against an Inefficient Government and Administration collect 1,204 student signatures calling for a restructuring of MassPIRG's funding methods.

The amendment, which failed to pass, asks students if they would prefer to change the MassPIRG fee to a "positive check-off," meaning students would voluntarily mark the appropriate box to pay the $4 fee, instead of forcing this responsiblility on students who choose to avoid payment.

"The number of people who signed this petition equal more than the number of people who voted last year in every single senate race," Rothman said.

MassPIRG members said if the question is placed on the ballot, it could mean disastrous results for their organization.

"You can't plan a budget through a donation system. We won't know how much money we have," said member Dave Kaptinski.

David Lippeat, a member of MassPIRG for two years, said the conservative senators were not fighting for the students, but for their own private interests.

"They attack our funding system, but they're really after our issues," Lippeat said. "These are ultra-conservatives who are told by industries [who create pollution] to try to attack PIRGs because PIRGs are very effective in forcing them to pay for this."

But, Rothman said, "I think businesses who pollute should have to pay. This question is not critical of their organization, it is critical of their way of getting funding from students."

Rothman said the failed amendment will not prevent the students from voting on the issue. SAIGA will continue to lobby students and gather signatures representing ten percent of the 19,000 undergraduate student population required to place the question on the ballot, he said.

In other business, Sen. David O'Hearn said several residents in his building received their telephone bills from AT&T and were outraged by the 10 percent late fee which will be added to their bill if it is not paid by the deadline. The senate unanimously passed a motion denouncing this fee.

ours is really the same thing ... they want to be first class."

The presence of a competing set of recommendations, Tsongas said, "will hold a gun to our heads" to make the proposals by Jenifer work.

Much more consideration and even legislative action would be needed before either plan takes effect. The special commission submitted its plan to the University of Massachusetts trustees. They would continue with plan, make some changes and present it to the regents.

The regents, meanwhile, will hold a full meeting next week on Jenifer's proposal and plan to await reaction from various campuses before approving a final plan in May.

Gordon Oakes Jr., chairman of the University of Massachusetts trustees, said of the special commission report, "I would hope that nobody is wasting their time ... I would think the Board of Regents would want to consider the trustees."

Under the current University system, a single president and board of trustees controls the University of Massachusetts Amherst and Boston campuses and the Worcester medical school. Each of those campuses has a chancellor. Lowell and Southeastern Massachusetts are separate universities with their own presidents and trustees.

Under Jenifer's proposal to the regents, the medical school would remain in Worcester but would become a branch of the Amherst campus. The medical school would be downgraded bureaucratically by losing a chancellor and having only its own dean.

Lowell and SMU would change their names to the University of Massachusetts at Lowell and the University of Massachusetts at Dartmouth. The possibility that the Massachusetts Maritime Academy be taken over by SMU is being studied, Jenifer said.

Greek author to speak tonight

By NANCY COHEN
Collegian Staff

Professor Speros Vryonis is scheduled to speak tonight at the University of Massachusetts on "The Greeks and the Sea." Vryonis is the director of New York University's Onassis Institute for Hellenic Studies.

Vryonis, a noted historian on Greek history and culture, has written and edited 15 books and more than 80 articles on this subject.

Vryonis graduated from Rhodes College in 1950. Since then he has been both a doctoral student and an instructor at Harvard University. He also was the director of the G.E. von Grunebaum Center of Near Eastern Studies at the University of California.

Not only has he excelled as both a student and a professor, but has also won numerous scholarships and awards, including the Fulbright Scholarship, American School of Classical Studies, the Haskins medal. Vryonis is holder of a Guggenheim Fellowship and a member of the Board of Senior Fellows in Dumbarton Oaks.

Vryonis, 60, was born in Memphis, Tennessee. His parents are from the Greek island of Cephallenia. Though born in this country, Vryonis said he has always considered himself as a Greek.

The event is sponsored by the Hellenic Student Association. Spilios Livanos, president of the organization, said this event is part of a series of designed "to expose [American] society to Greek culture, traditions, history and people,."

The lecture and slide presentation will focus on how the sea has influenced Greek history throughout the centuries to the present day.

The lecture is scheduled for 8 p.m. today in Campus Center 165-169. A question and answer period will follow, along with a reception which will include Greek food and soft drinks.

SAFA holds record of interviews in D.C.

By ERIN ABBEY
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — Students Advocating Financial Aid set a record this year, holding 168 interviews with legislators and their aids, the SAFA president said yesterday.

"I've seen more enthusiam this year than ever," SAFA member Mike Cromwell told the tired but cheering SAFA crowd on the bus before it pulled away last night from the Skyline Inn.

During SAFA's visit to the capital, he said they were able to tell congressmen they opposed the idea of cutting financial aid to institutions if the institutions have more than 20 percent of their students defaulting on loans.

He also said SAFA was able to get feedback from legislators on their stance toward national service proposals.

The proposals essentially would require students to perform public service, either in the military or community, to be eligible for financial aid. The proposals differ on how long students must serve and whether the service would be mandatory or voluntary.

After hearing many legislators' proposals, Cromwell said SAFA supports obtaining financial aid through voluntary national service as a supplement to existing financial aid programs.

SAFA members said many legislators remembered their organization from previous visits.

"I didn't have to explain what SAFA was as much," as in past years, said SAFA vice president Keith Rogers.

SAFA's efforts have become known to the Bush administration's Department of Education, he said. On Tuesday the House Sub-Committee on Labor-Education Appropriations and Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education Kenneth Whitehead met for a hearing on the administration's fiscal year 1990 budget request for student financial assistance and guaranteed student loans.

Before the hearing, committee member Rep. Silvio Conte, R-Mass., told SAFA members, "We'll be in there pitching and swinging for no cuts, if not additional money."

In the hearing, Conte told Whitehead that SAFA members, who attended the meeting, have come to the capital for nine years to lobby legislators not to cut financial aid.

"We could actually see that Silvio Conte would communicate our ideas to the department of education," said Cromwell. "That gives us national prestige when you hear Silvio Conte talk about us for about three minutes."

On the bus ride back to Massachusetts, SAFA members, most of whom had homework laying in their laps, highlighted their trip.

Rob Skiva, a second year member, said he met for half an hour with Rep. Pat Williams, D-Mont. Skiva said they discussed loan defaults, and Williams said he would look into the issue further.

"He learned some things from us," Skeva said.

Eileen Reilly, who also was at the meeting, added, "He opened up a working relationship with [SAFA]. And I think that's the most important thing."

Maria Park said in many of her meetings legislative aides took notes on her comments because the aides were not knowledgable about financial aid issues.

"So basically we were educating them," she said.

One of the aides, she said, told her that administrators from high schools and colleges should lobby in Washington against financial aid cuts.

"What that implies is that not enough people besides SAFA are lobbying," Park said.

In the end Cromwell said, "They'll remember the feeling of doing something for other students around the country."

Jewish women's stories told on tape

By JULIET JORDAN
Collegian Correspondent

The voices and stories of several Jewish women from throughout the world who fought stereotypes to gain success was presented recently in the Campus Center.

"Voices and Faces," sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Hillel and the Third World Caucus, was created and presented by UMass graduate Deborah Kutenpion.

The audio casette featured seven Jewish women who spoke at the National Women's Study Association Conference in 1986 about Judaism and feminism. Audio joined video, as the cassette was accompanied by a slide montage of the women.

"I heard the cassette and loved it," said Kutempion, "so I decided to put together slides out of photographs taken from various books for people to watch while they heard the cassette."

The slides showed Holocaust survivors, Jewish feminists and mothers, radicals, lesbians, and Sephardic and Ashkenazi Jews.

The cassette featured Jewish women who immigrated to America from Russia, Poland and the Middle East, Jewish mothers, Jewish women who became feminists, and a woman rabbi.

Hillel President Alisa Berkowitz and a UMass sophomore, said she was moved by the program.

"It was a beautiful way to show Jewish women," she said. "There are not many events specifically about Jewish women. It was . . . wonderful."

"There are big stereotypes about Jewish women on campuses," Berkowitz said. "Something like this shows how the stereotypes are so wrong and have no validity."

Alison Bukholtz, a UMass sophomore, said she thought the multimedia program was "empowering."

"The program gave a wider range of vision of Jews," she said. "It showed Ethiopian Jews and Spanish Jews, not just European Jews."

Buckholtz said she was glad to see a program that portrayed Jewish women positively, which she said was a reflection on all Jews. "There is so much anti-Israeli activity that it is good to reaffirm ourselves that we do have a heritage behind us," she said.

But not all students were at the forum solely to learn about Judaism.

Becca Gutman, a Hampshire College freshman, said she came to the program because she is interested in Women's Studies. "It's different to be a feminist and a Jew at the same time," she said. "That's what I'm trying to be now."

WOMEN'S ISSUES

Rides to D.C. rally organized

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

The president of the National Organization for Women has predicted that the March for Women's Equality in Washington, D.C. April 9 will be the largest march for women's rights in U.S. history.

And if some Amherst-area residents have their way, Molly Yard's expectations will become a reality.

Joanne Gray, president of the Amherst chapter of NOW, said about 300 people from the Amherst area have signed up to ride to the march on busses rented by the local group.

"Operation Rescue and other far-right groups have been trying to say that they are the majority," she said. "But we are going to show by marching on Washington that the number of people who want to keep abortion safe, funded, and legal are the majority."

Gray, a University of Massachusetts sophomore, said students and those not affiliated with the university, men and women, have signed up for the trip. She said she hopes to rent 10 busses, each of which could transport 47 people. Tickets for the trip cost $40, she said.

Because of difficulty finding enough busses, Gray said, NOW may combine efforts with a pro-choice group at Hampshire College to provide transportation.

And individuals as well as organizations are trying to help people reach the national rally.

Liz Rensenbrink, a UMass sophomore, said she and some friends in Butterfield Residence Hall have rented a van to bring them to the march. She said about 30 people have signed up, and she is considering renting another van so that all interested can be accommodated.

"I'm really excited about going. It's important because we're so close to losing the right to legal abortion," she said.

The Supreme Court legalized abortion 16 years ago in the decision Roe vs. Wade, but has decided to review federal protection of abortion this spring.

Gray said the march was organized by NOW to lobby for the Equal Rights Amendment, but keeping abortion legal became a second theme because of increasing attacks on the right to abortion by groups such as Operation Rescue and by President Bush.

Beginning March 15, tickets to the nation's capitol will also be sold through the Resource and Referral Program at the Everywoman's Center.

Arlene Avakian, a professor in the Women's Studies department, said the department does not have the resources to provide its own transportation to Washington, but she said, "The march is incredibly important at this time, and we are supportive of our students who are going to attend."

Former cancer patient helps others

By THOMAS CIAMPI
Collegian Correspondent

She'd had a mammogram four days earlier. Before the test, her doctors told her that the lump she had found on her breast was most likely a non-malignant cyst. But even before a confirming biopsy could be performed, doctors diagnosed Margaret Gosselin as having breast cancer.

"I was shocked and I was scared because I have two young children and a lot of adventures to still go on in life," she said.

"There were weak times, when I felt like I really might die," Gosselin said. But, she said, support from others and her own strength enabled her to embark on "an enormous research project with my husband and friends to figure out the very best ways in which I could heal."

She let friends and relatives know about her cancer, and soon was receiving suggestions and encouragement. "I made a decision to be more public about my cancer, so that people could see that you could meet cancer with hope, joy, and even with power to enhance your relationship with other people," she said.

Within three weeks, Gosselin had a masectomy, which she said was "practically painless" but forced her to adjust her feelings about her body. Soon after, she received chemotherapy for six months to check the further spread of cancer. Today, almost four years later, she continues hormone therapy, and each day the likelihood of cancer resurfacing decreases.

Gosselin said she attributes her recovery to excellent medical care, extensive research of cancer treatment, a community of friends and family, meditation, and God's grace.

Gosselin, 43, is now the director of the Cancer Counseling Center of Amherst, where cancer patients and their families and friends learn to develop the inner and outer resources necessary for coping with or even beating the disease.

She founded the center last spring after leading therapy groups for cancer patients with another therapist. Gosselin said she began helping cancer patients soon after her masectomy. "People started calling me up and talking to me [about cancer]," she said, and friends were recommending her as a therapist for cancer patients they knew.

In 1987, she received a master's degree in Professional Studies in Humanistic Psychology from the State University of New York and is now in the Private Consulting Psychology Doctoral Program at the University of Massachusetts. She said the program enables her "to keep focusing on the work that I do and gain additional skills and insight helpful to cancer therapy."

When she was diagnosed as having cancer, Gosselin, then living in Woodstock, New York, said she "shopped around" for the right surgeon. She found Bernie Siegal, M.D., author of "Love, Medicine, and Miracles."

"He spent immense amounts of time with me," she said. "He had a cot set up in my hospital room so my husband could move in with me. He encouraged me to decorate my hospital room, and to bring music into the operating room."

Gosselin said Siegal's non-traditional approach was encouraging. "Here was a man that not only talked about God, but didn't have a desk between us, and gave a hug at the end of the interview and was very respectful."

Siegal was an important part of Gosselin's "support network," she said. "The people you have around you are an extremely important aspect of survivability." People who have close connections with many people survive more than those who don't she said.

At the Cancer Counseling Center, Gosselin helps to develop these support networks for cancer patients. And, she said, depending on the individual, other means of coping including relaxation, meditation, and visualization — which can range from "finding an image or symbol with which to gobble up their cancer cells to imagining yourself as a small child" and remembering how illness was handled — are practiced.

Gosselin said some people come to the center to sort out their feelings and their thoughts while others are more interested in practicing stress reduction. Information regarding types of therapies is available, and patients can learn what it is like to experience chemotherapy and radiation treatments.

She said guilt is common among patients because they feel they are to blame for their cancer.

Margaret Gosselin, director of the Cancer Counseling Center in Amherst.

"I explain to them that they are not responsible for the cancer that they have, but they're responsible to the cancer...and responsible for figuring out the best ways to deal with it" in their own way," she said.

Cancer workshops at the center, located at 41 Summer Street in North Amherst, are held from 6 to 8 p.m. on Tuesdays. Albey Reiner, a UMass professor who teaches the Biology of Cancer, counsels with Gosselin at the workshops.

Indoor tanning poses health risks

HEALTHWATCH

By CAROL McCLATCHEY
Collegian Correspondent

So you want to become a Bahama Mama during spring break, but don't want to look like a rookie as you head for the beaches?

For the past month you have been heading to aerobics classes, armed with all the spandex clothing you could put your hands on. You are starting to feel optimistic about that revealing bathing suit you have had tucked away since last summer. But wait! You are missing one ingredient: the base tan from the local salon.

Caution, however, is the key word. Before scrounging up your remaining few dollars, remember that too much sun, whether it is natural or from florescent bulbs, is hazardous to your health.

Dr. James Ratner, a dermatologist in Amherst, said tanning salons give a "different exposure, but it's no safer."

Eric Zobler, owner of Utopia Spas in Amherst, said tanning salons are safe if used correctly, but that there are still risks involved. After approximately eight sessions, he said, "you get a good tan, but you will still need sunscreen."

According to Zobler, two types of UV light, UVA and UVB, are used in tanning salons. "Straight A rays create a surface tan that will go away," Zobler said, "But a B ray causes a deeper tan because it is more of a burning ray." His salon uses a balance of both, he said.

UV light accounts for only three percent of the light that penetrates the earth's atmosphere, but it is the most damaging to the skin. Because dark-skinned people have more of this pigment in their skin, they tan more readily than those with light skin.

Zobler and Ratner said individuals with fair skin and light-colored eyes and hair are most prone to burning and skin problems.

Ratner said incidences of skin cancer have been "increasing nationally. I see cases every day."

Skin cancer begins when cells grow uncontrollably, he said. "It is known that ultraviolet rays cause skin cancer, it destroys DNA. Most cells can repair the damage," Ratner said. But when there is too much damage, skin cancer results, he added.

There are protective measures that can be taken to counteract overexposure. "Sunscreens are protective as long as they are used properly. SPF, sun-protection factor, number 15 is the 'magic number' and will prevent against most damage," Ratner said.

Experiments with LSD topic of author's talk

By NATHAN KRYSTALL
Collegian Correspondent

Covert CIA operations and drug trafficking. Truth serums and espionage. Conspiracy.

These might sound like the elements to a plot in a Robert Ludlum novel but, in fact, they were the topic of a lecture Tuesday night at Hampshire College by writer Martin A. Lee.

Lee, the author of Acid Dreams, a "social history of the subculture of LSD," said LSD was used by the CIA to aid interrogation, and to discredit political leaders.

"LSD can be therapeutic," he said. "[But] it can be dangerous if abused, or used like the CIA did."

Lee said it was "ironic that in the 60s the 'New Left' viewed LSD as a 'mind-expanding sacrament' while the government was testing its potential as a political weapon."

To find volunteers for testing programs, Lee said the CIA would give heroin and opium as payment to heroin addicts.

The author said the CIA tested LSD as a "truth drug" for interrogation purposes. One problem they encountered, however, was that "sometimes people would be so elated that they thought they were God-in-heaven and would defy their interrogators," he said.

Lee said the CIA would also torture prisoners by slipping them the drug and "threatening to keep them in this crazy, drug-induced state forever" unless they divulged state secrets.

Lee, who researched more than 20,000 pages of CIA and military documents before writing his book, said the CIA even tried to discredit political leaders by slipping the LSD so that "they would become so discombobulated [they] would babble gibberish and discredit themselves in front of their followers."

"CIA priorities of internal security always take precedence over the priorities of drug control," he said.

He cited examples of drug trafficking heroin in order to fund anti-communist rebels in China and then in Afghanistan. During the war in Vietnam the CIA smuggled heroin home in G.I.'s body bags, he said.

places in the world, that can insure it, in a sense, a place on the map," Spector said.

Most of these countries were aided in reaching their current nuclear weapon capacities by nations that already possessed this technology. According to Spector, the United States, the Soviet Union and China all played roles in helping these nations achieve their current weapons status, but are now trying to limit the threat these nations may pose.

The nuclear capabilites of India, Pakistan, South Africa, and Israel vary widely in terms of their sophistication. And while none of these nations possess the nuclear capabilites of the US or the Soviet Union, they still pose a grave threat to human life, Spector said.

"It has been estimated that if India or Pakistan were to use only a dozen nuclear devices against each other, not aiming for the center of each others cities but aiming for peripheral locations, a million casualties might ensue," Spector said.

The history of conflict between nations in the Middle East, and the continued political and religous differences between India and Pakistan are some of the reasons these nations use to justify their pursuit of more advanced weapons technology.

"The Israelies now are facing a new kind of threat, the new threat of course is the missiles and chemical weapons that all their adversaries are getting," Spector said. The Israelis in turn use this as justification to acquire more nuclear technology, Spector said.

Treaties and international institutions, including the International Atomic Energy Agency, attempt to contain the spread of nuclear weapons through the monitoring and inspection of nuclear facilities around the world.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Quote in poor taste

I am writing in regard to a quote, by Leo Tolstoy, which was printed in the March 3 edition of the Collgian. It stated that "Historians are like deaf people who go on answering questions that no one has asked them." I am appalled to see that type of attitude existing here and printed in the school newspaper.

I am also confused as to why this quote was printed. Tolstoy is a celebrated writer, but even that event does not presume his authority of deaf people or historians. By printing this quote, the Collegian editors support and therefor perpetuate ignorance and unenlightened attitudes. This quote is neither true nor funny. Printing it exhibits poor taste and a lack of good judgement. As a Hard-of-Hearing individual, I take this as a great personal offense.

I am a second semester, out-of-state freshman who is disgusted by the treatment I am receiving from the university's housing services. Spring break is approaching and many students are going home or flying off to some luxurious vacation spot. According to University Housing, all dormitories will be closed during spring break. Unfortunately, I don't have $360 to fly home to Miami or $45 a night (for 10 nights) to stay in a hotel. So what am I supposed to do? I went to the housing office and politely explained my problem. I also told them that I have no friends or relatives in this state that could accommodate me for the break. I told them I have nowhere to go. The supervisor carelessly looked in my face and said, "I'm sorry sir, I can't help you."

The fact is, they can help me if they wanted to. If they weren't so selfish and uncaring, they would make an effort. It's up to the University to provide out-of-state and foreign exchange students some form of housing over the break, since they are the ones kicking us out of our dorms in the first place. The university is just causing additional and unnecessary expenses for the many foreign and out-of-state students who simply cannot afford other alternatives. What inconvenience is it for us to stay in our dorms? What is the purpose in having to close them? It's not as thought they take inventory or clean it while we're gone. We pay over $1000 a semester for our housing; we should be allowed to stay the entire semester.

I don't know where I'm going to go. Maybe I'll get a blanket and sleep out at the Hatch. It's not Florida, but at least it's warm.

Balloon releases pollute environment

The sight of approximately 200 colorful balloons rising our of the Southwest area last Thursday was indeed inspiring. The rationale behind this very visual display was to in some way heighten public awareness. I hope it will. The organizers of this event should be applauded for their intentions which are truly commendable. However, I would like to make the point that the method was at best, a very colorful, yet deliberate form of pollution (albeit without malice).

Chances are good that at least some of the balloons released here on Thursday descended into the Atlantic Ocean about three to four hours later (wind speeds at 1000 to 5000 feet are commonly 40 to 60 knots and have a west to east component in this area). Balloons from releases like this have been linked to the deaths of sperm whales, sea turtles and various other marine animals.

Two hundred balloons may not seem like much, perhaps none of those balloons made it farther than say, Quabbin Reservoir. They ended up somewhere out of our sight, but let's not lose sight of what we are doing to our environment. Consider the impact of 250,000 balloons released in celebration of our nation's bicentennial, or 1.1 million balloons released by Disneyland.

Non-biodegradable plastics of all sorts, not just balloons, present a significant long-term threat to many animal species. Balloon releases are a very visible media that seem to suggest to many people that it is okay to pollute.

I suggest we should choose not to pollute, and that we consider a ban on balloon releases here at UMass.

Anyone interested in more information on the impact of balloon releases and other plastics on the environment should contact the Balloon Alert Project, 12 Pine Drive; Toms River, New Jersey, 08755.

Shakespeare's "classic" endorses lies

Tonight, the theater department takes a nostalgic look back at a time when Christians gave Jews and other heretics a choice — believe in Jesus or die.

Darren Garnick

For those of you not familiar with the plot of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, here's a summary of what the theater department neglected to mention in their press release:

Out of friendship, a Jewish moneylender (Shylock) arranges an interest-free loan for a struggling, young businessman (Antonio). However, their contract contains some not-so-friendly fine print. If the loan isn't paid back, Shylock has the legal right to 16 ounces of choice Antonio meat. Shylock's exact words to Antonio are "If you repay not on such a day, in such a place, such sum or sums as are expressed in the condition, let the forfeit be nominated for an equal pound of your fair flesh, to be cut off and taken in what part of your body pleaseth me."

Before Shylock can sharpen his steak knives, the Venetian judicial system intervenes. Shylock is forced to convert to Christianity and half of his wealth is confiscated. Antonio and the rest of the non-Jews live happily ever after.

Throughout medieval Europe, Jews were blamed for the Bubonic Plague, forced to wear ridiculous yellow cones on their heads, restricted to ghettos and murdered in mass riots. What justified this treatment was the belief that Jews were the devil's children. An alleged Jewish satanic ritual was the use of Christian babies' blood to bake Passover matzoh. Hemoglobin gave unleavened bread its zesty flavor. With the publication of The Merchant of Venice in 1600, Shakespeare used his influence and popularity to spread this lie and give it more credibility.

The play is a comedy. Shakespeare knew his audience would pay to laugh at Shylock, the funny-looking Jew. Jews, it should be mentioned, were expelled from England in 1290 and not readmitted until 1655.

Shakespeare's text doesn't cast suspicion on an individual character, but on an entire nationality. Out of 68 conversational references, Shylock is not called by name 54 times. He is mentioned as "the Jew," "the villian Jew," or the ever-popular "dog Jew." Anyone still unconvinced need only to hear subtle passages like "I am a Jew if I serve the Jew any longer," or "certainly the Jew is the very devil incarnation."

Read the following "paragraph" and ask yourself what type of images it suggests:

Jew. Jew. SNEAKY. Jew. Jew. Jew. BLOODTHIRSTY. Jew. Jew. Jew.
Jew. GREED. Jew. Jew. Jew. Jew. DEVIL. Jew. Jew. Jew. EVIL. Jew. Jew. Jew. Jew. Jew. VICIOUS. Jew. Jew.

Fill the gaps with a storyline and you have The Merchant of Venice.

Students are force-fed Shakespeare by teachers who worship his plays like gods. Everything Shakespeare writes is a "classic." Why? Because he's Shakespeare. Willie never wrote a piece of trash in his life.

Maybe it's time we redefine what a "classic" is. Has talent become so respected that we ignore how that talent is used? Doesn't content matter? Communication scholars adore D.W. Griffith's Birth of a Nation, a film that embraces the Ku Klux Klan. The film's racist message is overlooked by those lauding Griffith's brilliant editing techniques. I put Griffith and Shakespeare in the same category: artists who preserve and perpetuate bigotry. I acknowledge their skills, but I don't have to honor them as people.

I've been exposed to Shakespeare's work, but the fact that he endorsed lies about my religion prevents me from enjoying it. Someone that hated me 368 years before I was born, deserves neither my respect nor admiration.

The hurt of acquaintance rape lasts a lifetime

Three years ago tonight my entire life changed. I went to a party, met up with some friends, and got more than a ride home.

It's hard to believe it was three years ago — I remember it like it was yesterday. I remember being at the party and feeling flattered by the attention of this man I had a crush on and had come to respect. I also remember the ride home, and how I felt when he pushed me into sex I didn't want.

I tried to deny what was going on. My mind kept saying this can't be happening, he's too good a person; but my body knew it was being violated. I felt betrayed.

He took more than my right to say no that night — he took my ability.

The changes were subtle at first. I began doubting myself. When a friend approached me the next day, I told her everything had gone fine.

I denied my anger, blaming myself. I though it was my fault because I had accepted the ride home. I grew cautious of being alone with men, even men I knew I could trust.

Even now, the experience affects the way my mind and body react to other people. As recently as Monday night I could not let my lover touch me. Somehow my body responded the way it did that night. I curled into a ball and could not stop crying. My friend tried to comfort me, but I had to get away.

Although I am learning to trust again, I need other people to understand what is going on. I have to remind myself that I'm not wrong to take the time I need.

Today is sexual assault awareness day. Exactly three years since my rape, and finally I feel some validation. This is a first step toward acknowledging the effect date rape has on everyone. Date rape does not just effect the woman who was raped, it effects every woman's ability to trust and the way they perceive the men they meet.

Whether you or someone in your life has been raped or not, date rape influences your life. Use this day to think about how date rape has affected you.

Childcare takes two parents, it's not just a women's issue

After reading magazines and newspapers, and watching the news, I've got a question for all of the socially aware and socially oblivious students who are reading this: Why is childcare considered strictly a women's issue?

Pamela McCarthy

Don't get me wrong. I'm glad childcare is getting some attention. Most of the articles I have read have been pretty sympathetic — towards women. They want to help us with our problem. How wonderful, how progressive, finally a step in the right direction.

Or is it?

Did any of these people take sex ed in school? Did they ever have the infamous "talk" with their parents? (You know, the one where your folks turned a beautiful shade of fushia and stammered so much that you couldn't understand what secret of nature they were trying to tell you.) By now, it should be understood that there are two people needed to reproduce: males and females.

So what is this crap about childcare being strictly a woman's issue?

Someone once told me that since women carry the child, it is up to her to worry about how that child will be cared for. If I was a man, I'd be pretty offended. I doubt that many fathers are so callous and cold to be indifferent to the needs of their own flesh and blood. I know it sounds maudlin, but come on, let's get real. Most fathers (I would hope) want their children, so they would see to it that their kids get the best of care.

Since GQ isn't speaking for them, I'm going to be pretentious and get up on a soapbox on the side of the poor, hapless dads of this world.

These poor guys. Here they are, trying to be good fathers. They've planned and hoped and worked to make the big day of reproduction possible. They want their kids be cared for by competent people. Maybe the father and the mother have to work to pay for minor, inconsequential luxuries. You know, heat, rent/mortgage, electricity, food, clothing, medical care, and other frivolous things. So they and the mothers, for whatever reason, can't stay at home. It doesn't mean that these men don't care. It doesn't mean that they don't want to take an active role in choosing childcare.

Yet, the only places you can really get any information are women's magazines, and the women's sections of newspapers. Why aren't the needs of childcare on the front pages for everyone to read? Why doesn't GQ run some articles on the problems of childcare?

Since it takes two to make a baby, I think it's just a wee bit sexist to delegate issues such as childcare to the women's issues pages and women's magazines. We are getting a painfully clear message from all of this. We are told that we haven't really come a long way. We may not be barefoot and in the kitchen anymore, but we are still the only ones who are expected to worry about the kids. Forget the fact that the sole guilt trip of putting them in daycare falls upon us, some of those fathers may feel guilty, too. So why are women the ones expected to be fighting for day care, and not men?

It's not fair to any of us.

Boycott of Domino's encouraged

As the issue of a woman's choice to have an abortion has again come to the forefront of our dinner conversations, I wish to add this bit of news.

I learned recently through a news article in the March issue of Ms magazine that the owner of the Domino's pizza chain uses some of his profits to support Michigan's "Right to Life's Committee to End Tax-Funded Abortions." Through this committee's work, the citizens of Michigan voted on their November referendum to ban Medicaid-funded abortions thereby limiting the rights of poor women to receive proper care when having an abortion.

Tom Monaghan, Domino's president, evidently gave the Right to Life organization a $50,000 personal donation, but it also seems that another of his corporations, which makes its money from Domino's pizza sales, gave a $10,000 donation to the same group.

In addition, Monaghan is embroiled in a court suit with the Ann Arbor chapter of NOW because he refused the group access to his public facility when he learned that their event would raise money for pro-choice causes. NOW has filed a religious discrimination suit.

We often feel that there is little we can do for a cause unless we publicly march and carry signs for it. The truth is that there are more powerful signs of support than putting your physical body on a bus to Washington, D.C.

We have economic power which is unquestioned in the entire Pioneer Valley. It is in the pizza we do or do not buy. I know that our own house at Smith College has been keeping the new Northampton Domino's in business. A group of us in Capen House is taking a stand in support of our beliefs by buying our future pizzas from other restaurants.

I hope that others on all five campuses and elsewhere will support this economic boycott and show Tom Monahaghan that we will not support his personal beliefs.

DC criticizes Nutritionist feature

You will be committing a disservice to your readers if you decide not to print these clarifications of John Swanson's article ("Nutritionist: at DC's, dine with care," March 7).

Swanson misunderstood Zabawa regarding quality standards for meat used by the Food Services Department. There are standards for all of our meat products. All meat products used in the US must be inspected by the USDA for wholesomeness. Certain standards for "sanitary quality" must be met. US meat packers are not, however, required to use the USDA grading system which rates the previously inspected "wholesome and sanitary" meat in classes of "quality and palatability." This type of grading is done by desirebility (thus affecting the price) in USDA categories from best quality down: "Prime," "Choice," "Good," "Standard," and "Commercial." Food Services meats have all been inspected for wholesomeness and sanitary quality as well as standardized by grades or specific requirements. Swanson's article implied the DC's don't use a service provided by the USDA to food businesses for grading meat. This is incorrect. It's a service provided to meat producers which is voluntary.

In his quotations from Shelia Gilroy, Swanson relayed Giroy's understanding of what the Food Services Dietitians do: that we "advise on products given the financial constraints of a state system" and that ours is "the task of trying to keep thousands of people well-fed while dealing with company contracts and the university's bureaucracy." This is true but overlooks some important components. We are required to choose products by price secondarily to quality. Choices are made by test panels that are conducted twice weekly. One of the main reasons why we reject products is student prefereces. Feedback through comment cards and surveys helps guide menu preparation. We would rather serve the puffed wheat and oat bran instead of the Cap'n Crunch. However, as a business, we must meet the demands from our customers, which far exceed the more nutritious choices. For this reason, we provide individual nutrition consultations as well as weekly table tents and bulletin board information on a myriad of nutrition topics.

As for the reference to "company contracts and University bureaucracy," I hope none of your readers assumed some implication of collusion on the part of our purchasing department and the hundreds of vendors from whom we buy thousands of products. Our testing procedures and the University's accounting and procuremnt departments make such suspicious practices virtually impossible.

Interview exhibited ignorance

We would like to respond to Monday's article ("The view from the mount on the Five-College Scene," March 6). The author of the article, Kristina Deniu, made it clear that the views in the article were not hers, but only those of a limited group of people. Yet the people she interviewed for the article showed callous, stereotyped attitudes towards the students of the Five College area in their comments.

On a personal level, the comments of the women who were interviewed about Amherst students were especially offensive. The author states that many women at Mount Holyoke see typical Amherst students as being "conservative, preppy, clean-cut, extremely uptight, and snobby." Aside from being a sweeping generalization that is blatantly wrong, this comment shows a lack of open-mindedness and an air of ignorance. Anyone who takes more than a cursory glance at the Amherst student body, or gets to know a few students here, will see how that statement is way off the mark.

One woman said of the Amherst parties, "It's a nice place to drink, but you wouldn't want to talk to anyone there." This statement proves our point. Why wouldn't you want to talk to anyone at Amherst? Maybe if you took the time to do so, instead of just drinking our beer, you might be in for a surprise!

The article turns into a direct attack upon Amherst men. Another woman says, "Their parties are filled with people who are unfriendly and boring," (how would they know if they don't talk to us?)"...and the men are simply not attractive. It's basically a bunch of not-so-good-looking guys sitting around waiting for beautiful girls to fall all over them." Ouch. We don't object to her saying the men at Amherst are not good looking, that's her opinion. To say we wait for beautiful girls to fall into our laps is silly. We try not to judge people based on their looks, as these women seem to do.

This brings up a larger issue. By constantly alluding to people's appearances and gender, and not taking steps to get aquainted with them, stereotypes are created and propogated. Opinions such as these lead to harsher stereotypes, such as racism and sexism. Opinions based on speculation, pre-judgment, and first impressions is dangerous. We hope that these few Mount Holyoke women open their minds before they open their mouths again.

Amount of posters unnecessary

Dear SGA candidates:

As I sit in my economics lecture in Mahar auditorium, I am distracted from my professor. The distraction comes from the 50-plus brightly colored campaign posters bearing the all-too familiar slogans. What are you trying to prove? Come on, over 50 posters in one lecture hall?!

Everywhere I go on this campus, I am assaulted by your feeble attempts to gain recognition and support for position in the student government. I have never seen such a horrible waste of paper.

I expect that all the students who vote on March 14 understand who they are voting for when they check off a name on the ballot. I hope that they do not make their choice based on the amount of posters they see, but rather base it on the character and ability of a candidate. Remember, during these trying times at the university, we need quality, not quantity.

P.S. I hope you are responsible enough to remove all of these posters when the elections are over.

Campus radicals hold progressive ideologies

By MICHELLE MELLMAN
Collegian Correspondent

The Radical Student Union is one of the more recognizable on-campus groups offered to UMass students. An umbrella organization, the RSU is composed primarily of left-wing students with varying ideologies.

Owen, a freshman student and member of the radical organization said, "The Radical Student Union gives students an opportunity to voice their opinions and get involved with certain activities. They can come here and meet students with the same views."

"There's a large diversity within the RSU. We have some socialists, some social democrats and some anarchists, but we're all radicals," said Pierre, a graduate student.

The RSU originated eight years ago from the Revolutionary Student Brigade (founded during the Nixon era). Today, the RSU consists of twenty active members and a large number of non-active members.

"The number of members fluctuates immensely depending on the project," Owen said. "The largest turnout of members was two years ago, when the RSU, Abby Hoffman, Amy Carter and many others gave their support in driving the CIA off of the campus . . . it worked," he added.

In addition to meeting others with common views, RSU members involve themselves with a number of ongoing activities. At weekly meetings, members discuss upcoming rallies, petitions, guest speakers and films.

Members of the Radical Student Union are taking part in the shanty demonstration currently being held outside of the Student Union building. "Cutback City" protests the recent budget cuts imposed on the state higher education system.

An upcoming march on Washington protesting cutbacks, militarism, intervention and other matters, may increase the number of members within the RSU.

"The RSU teaches students what role they can play to make a difference and to help change certain social issues and specific movements," Pierre said.

Asked how they were viewed by others, Owen said, "We are viewed positively by the progressive community, I don't know about the others. We're far from the mainstream. I think we're often viewed as a rowdy group."

Senior psychology major Michelle Hakkila agrees. "I never hear them (RSU) mentioned unless it is about some kind of riot or protest. I don't think it's one of the University's more neccessary groups, but to each his own," she said.

"All they do is look for a controversial issue and exaggerate it . . . to make their society noticed in the public eye," said Kurt Weiser, a junior landscape architecture major.

Holly Harrington, a senior sociology major, reflected on the RSU's effect on her as an individual: "I've been here for four years and nothing they've done seems to stick out in my mind . . . but then again, I'm not into right-wing politics."

Avildsen leans on familiar theme in lukewarm new film

By DOUG MIDDLETON
Collegian Correspondent

Lean On Me
Hampshire Six Theaters

Lean On Me has the classic John Avildsen underdog theme. Only this time the director is not focusing on a lone fighter, as he did quite well in both 1976 Best Picture Rocky and The Karate Kid a few years back. Now, he's turning to an entire high school of underachievers.

The film is based on a true story concerning the efforts of a former teacher turned principal trying to clean up his former high school teaching grounds from all the forces undermining the students' education.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Drugs, fighting, lackluster teachers and deplorable building conditions are rampant at Eastside High. But principal Joe Clark is not going to stand for any of it. He irritates the mayor and parents by chaining the firedoors to keep the drug pushers he has expelled out of Eastside. Clark takes a "walk tall and carry a big stick" adage to heart, but uses a baseball bat instead.

The main problem of the film is the glossed over treatment of the subject matter. There are legitimate questions basically ignored by the film about Clark's tactics, but anyone who questions them in the film is presented in such a negative light that the sympathy is shifted to the principal without proper motivation. Avildsen's underdog theme adds up to far too many cornball scenes. I was astounded that during a class assembly, no students caused any trouble and all of them are singing their lungs out to hearts content. This school is turned around faster than it takes John Tower to down a couple of scotch and sodas.

There are other minor problems. The mayor is a total moron, a la Murray Hamilton from Jaws and countless other Hollywood films that depict authority figures who are against the ideology of the main character as brainless wimps. (See the police and the F.B.I in the recent video release of Die Hard for a standard example.)

Then why did I ignore the corny scenes (wait till you see the ending) and the all-too-neat representation of this "true" story. The answer is Morgan Freeman, an actor who gives an intense performance. Like his recent Academy Award nominated performance in Street Smart, he is the main reason to see the film. Watching Freeman as his eyes follow a student who has just said goodbye to him and quit school, he tells the kid, "You'll be dead in a year." In a tight close-up, we see the pain in the face of a man who learns that no matter how noble a mission is, there will always be defeats.

There are powerful scenes with other capable actors. One involves Beverly Todd as the vice-principal beautifully telling Clark off concerning his treatment of teachers. Another has Freeman and a student, Samms, begging him for one more chance after being caught dealing drugs. Jermaine Hopkins plays Samms with a comic flair that gives his character a realistically portrayed spirit.

See the film, though with reservations. This a crowd pleaser and not an accurate account of Clark and the plight of public education. Mississippi ▪ urning received some flack for distorting facts but the film never claimed to be telling a true account of murdered civil rights workers. Lean On Me is a film whose real intent has been Lemon Pledged by director Avildsen.

Judy Tenuta at CC tonight

If someone started calling you "stud puppet" or "love slave", you'd probably laugh so much your cheekbones would become sore.

That's what you'll be called Thursday night at the Campus Center Auditorium by comedian Judy Tenuta. The show, part of the HBO/American Express comedy showcase, is sponsored by the Board of Governors.

Tenuta, one of comedy's hottest new talents, recently appeared on the HBO comedy special "One Night Stand." She' also been a guest on the "Tonight Show" and "Late Night With David Letterman."

Much of Tenuta's material derives from her college years, recounting her time spent with her roomate, "a short, fat girl who wanted to be a mime." Tenuta is known as a "petite flower" and "love goddess" and plays accordian during her stand-up routine.

This is a good chance to see Judy Tenuta live, and a good chance for a nice cheekbone workout.

Local metal quintet gets a lesson in music business

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Correspondent

In the music industry jungle, many bands fight to gain recognition, but few are realistic enough to consider earning a college education first. The five UMass students that make up Kyruss see things differently.

The band is comprised of two freshman, Jeff Morace (vocals) and Jason Elliott (drums), and three sophomores, Spider Mike Ryan (guitar), Mike Gworek (guitar) and Sean Ricker (bass).

Kyruss developed when Jason met with Spider and Mike at Holyoke High school in 1986. Losing their original bass player in late 1988, they found Ricker through an ad in an Amherst music shop. Asked how he feels about being a member of Kyruss, ricker replied, "It's great working with musicians that are making something real, something different."

The band members share the common influences of Led Zeppelin, Black Sabbath, Metallica, Megadeth, Queensrych and Fate's Warning. Kyruss is an original, progressive heavy metal group concerned with intelligent lyrical content and complex musical arrangements. They don't want to be a passing fad. As Jeff Morace puts it, "We want to stay true to ourselves and never sell out."

With a realistic outlook on life, there was never a doubt in any of the band members' minds about going to college.

"We centered our college life around the band by deciding to go to the same college," Jason Elliot said.

Ricker added, "The people you meet in a college atmosphere expose you to different viewpoints and open your mind."

Although because of their studies they cannot make a full time commitment to the band, the members of Kyruss feel that right now their education is just as important as their musical career. However, music is their ultimate goal and if offered a secure record deal, school would take a back seat.

Individually, the group practices whenever they can or whenever the mood strikes them. But getting together to figure out new tunes and go over old tunes proves to be a difficulty. There is always a conflict in class or work schedules. They have been shut off many times, even on Saturday afternoons. Elliot commented, "The University residential system really makes it hard for a band to exist." As of yet, Kyruss has played only a few small clubs, a couple of talent shows and some parties. They have acquired a large following in Holyoke, but have no exposure to the UMass crowd. Jeff claims that it is hard for metal bands to get gigs because of the negative stereotypes associated with that type of music. It was this kind of prejudice that the band feels prevented them from performing at the Southwest Battle of the Bands. Ricker commented, "We cannot stand discrimination of any kind."

This in mind, it is understandable that the members of Kyruss are totally psyched for their upcoming gig at Katina's in Hadley. They play this Sunday March 12 as the opening act for Stranger, another local metal band. Show starts at 9 p.m.

Kinski's level of excellence stays high with biography

By WILLIAM JAMES
Collegian Correspondent

All I Need Is Love
Klaus Kinski
Random House

If debauchery, intelligence, extreme lack of bullshit and genius, all tossed up with a European accent, hold any interest to you whatsoever, then Klaus Kinski's autobiography All I Need Is Love should either be the only book you ever read, or at least, the only book you read between now and the next one.

Book Review

Kinski writes in the present tense, and makes the reader feel as if he/she has come across the journal of a very alive and kicking 60 year old rock and rolling actor, as opposed to having shelled out 20 bucks for the privilege.

He relates in a simple, extremely readable style and tone, all of his more extreme experiences from childhood to the present, to say that this man's life has been one long extreme experience, especially when compared to most all of his contemporaries, would be an understatement. There was only one real problem with this book, it ended.

On the final page of his autobiography one finds Kinski in the jungles of the Amazon working on "Fitzcarraldo" with the "ignorant, inept, arrogant, thoughtless idiot Herzog," he receives a letter from his son:

"Please be careful of the snakes
I love you
Nanhoi."

Throughout this epic of a life story of a book, these snakes (pseudo artistes such as Herzog and other ever critical little people in general) continually try to shake this comparably great man. Kinski has not been careful - he has not allowed himself to become an artistic coward by way of compromise, as do so many others. He has been reckless, weird and wonderful because he has been true.

Kinski has lived, acted and now written with complete sincerity. He's suffered for it - the last words of his autobiography are telling:

"I feel sick."

But he is alive, and more so than most any other person I can imagine right now.

Read this book if you give a shit.

Eastern pilots, machinists rally

BOSTON (AP) — Eastern Airlines' shuttle continued operating yesterday while striking machinists and pilots got support from other unions at a frigid midday rally in downtown Boston.

The number of shuttle flights between Boston, New York and Washington was cut, many were delayed and passenger volume was low. But just keeping the high-profile shuttle going was a victory of sorts for the airline, which warned that it could soon be in bankruptcy.

Despite 17-degree weather and biting wind, approximately 80 machinists, pilots and members of non-Eastern unions rallied outside Eastern's ticket office at Government Center, a brick plaza surrounding Boston City Hall.

William Burke, a 42-year-old construction worker, came to the rally from a nearby job site during his lunch break. Pointing to his green hard hat, he called himself "a working man fed up with corporate greed" and said he believed the success or failure of the Eastern strike would carry over to the labor movement as a whole.

"After PATCO eight years ago, we all saw what happened," he said, referring to the air traffic controllers' strike that ushered in a period of retrenchment for unions across the nation. "We're not going to let that happen again."

His brother, Jay Burke, 35, also a construction worker, echoed those sentiments.

"I'm sick of the last eight years of anti-union legislation and the National Labor Relations Board rolling back decisions," he said. "This'll be the final frontier as far as we're concerned. We'll fight them all the way on this one."

Joining in the rally were garment workers, government employees, electricians, bus drivers and workers from General Electric Co.'s aircraft engine plant in Lynn, said John S. Laughlin, spokesman for the Massachusetts AFL-CIO.

William Conley, chief shop steward for Local 1726 of the International Association of Machinists, said Eastern's striking unions were developing contingency plans for a possible bankruptcy.

Environmentalists vow to fight building of lake

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Environmental groups vowed Wednesday to battle state plans to create a 25-acre lake in protected wetlands at the base of the state's highest peak. The manmade lake would be part of a proposed multimillion-dollar, state-backed condominium resort.

Spokesmen for groups including the Sierra Club, the Massachusetts Audubon Society and the Berkshire Natural Resouces Council maintained the state would be bypassing its own laws by building the lake at the base of Mount Greylock in the northern Berkshires.

"We consider this a broadside attack on the state's wetlands protection laws," Priscilla Chapman of the Sierra Club said in a ttelephone interview. "The governor and his people are absolutely asking for a confrontation, and... they are going to get one."

Ms. Chapman said the law allows the state Department of Environmental Quality Engineering to approve destruction of wetlands and other protected wildlife habitat only in cases of overriding public interest.

"If a developer's desire to put a phony lake in the middle of a private second-home development is a public purpose of overriding importance, I would be hard pressed to think of anything that wouldn't qualify for a variance," she said.

But Richard Carnaghi, senior vice president of the Heritage Development Corp. of Southbury, Conn., said the lake was central to its proposed development and could not be dropped. In conjunction with the state, the company is seeking the build a four-season resort village, featuring golf and cross-country skiing, on a 1,040-acre site on the lower slopes of the mountain. The upper reaches of the wild peak are a protected state reservation.

Following protests from environmentalists, the state proposed a compromise last summer under which Heritage agreed to scale back its initial $280 million project, including 1,275 condominiums and hotel accommodations for 3,000 overnight guest, to a maximum of 850 condominiums.

In return, the state, which appropriated $8 million for the project in 1985, agreed to construct $20 million of recreational amenities, including the gold course, alpine and cross-country ski trail and the lake.

Gary M. Briers, a planner for the state Department of Environmental Management who has been supervising the Greylock project, said a state consultant looked at alternatives to the lake but found on other way to provide a place for people to swim or provide a sufficient source of water making snow for ski trails.

Eastern Airlines employees and union supporters cheer at rally yesterday in Boston.

Eastern strike

"They may get my job, but they won't break the union. As long as I come out of this with my dignity, my pride and my union intact, then organized labor has won," he said.

Throughout yesterday, the fifth day of the strike, the machinists and pilots maintained a picket line of about 60 people outside Logan International Airport. Conley said sympathetic workers for other airlines, including Piedmont machinists and Delta pilots, joined in.

Massachusetts Port Authority spokeswoman Dee Clarke said the number of passengers on the Eastern shuttle was "very low," while its main competitor, Pan Am, was deluged with customers.

On an average day, Eastern has 48 departures from Logan and an equal number of arrivals. but only the shuttle was running yesterday, and the airline managed just eight departures and six arrivals by 3 p.m., Clarke said.

Aside from delays of 40 minutes to an hour in departures for many of the shuttle flights, however, the airport appeared to be running smoothly.

In a show of solidarity with their Eastern colleagues, some pilots for other airlines began a deliberate slowdown in their work, laboriously checking their scheduled flight plans with the tower and requesting that all radio transmissions be repeated. but there were no significant delays, said Michael Ciccarelli, regional spokesman for the Federal Aviation Administration.

Birch Society to leave state

BOSTON (AP) — The John Birch Society is pulling up roots and moving out of the liberal stronghold of Massachusetts, but a spokesman said yesterday the arch-consevatives wee driven away by prices, not politics.

"The aspects of Massachusetts that we couldn't take was the expense to live here," said John McManus, spokesman in the group's Belmont headquarters.

The 31-year-old society, which once labeled President Dwight D. Eisenhower a "dedicated, conscious agent of the communist conspiracy," has struggled financially for years, making a public appeal for funds after founder Robert H.W. Welch Jr. died in 1985.

"If anybody in the Midwest wants to say thank you to anybody for the John Birch Society moving in that area they can thank (Governor) Michael Dukakis, they can thank Senator Ted Kennedy and the Massachusetts congressional delegation," McManus said.

The group plans to close its Belmont and San Marino, Calif., offices and consolidate operations in Appleton, Wis., by the fall. Reasons for the move include lower overhead and the fact that the new chief executive officer, G. Allen Bubolz, lives in Appleton, McManus said.

Appleton also is near Grand Chute, hometown of Republican Sen. Joseph McCarthy, which McManus termed "a delightful piece of irony." McCarthy, who was later censured by his colleagues, chaired probes into alleged communist activities in the 1950s.

McManus said the move had nothing to do with the recent death of Welch's widow, Marian, or with the politics of Massachusetts. But he said it is part of an austerity plan to save money.

The society listed 1987 liabilities of $8.5 million in its latest filing with the state attorney general's public charities division. The fund balance showed a loss of $7.8 million, compared with a starting deficit of $7.7 million.

Teacher seeks separation after 9-year wait for mate

LYNN (AP) — A high school language teacher who lobbied for the nine years for the release of her Russian fiance from the Soviet Union is seeking an annulment less than nine months after marrying him.

Elizabeth Condon, a high school language teacher, wants an annulment from Viktor M. Novikov, charging that he only wanted to come to the United States.

The couple made headlines a year ago when they were reunited after nearly 10 years apart because Novikov was unable to leave the Soviet Union. The reunion, after years of persistent lobbying by Condon, came on the eve of the 1988 Reagan-Gorbachev superpower summit.

Condon, 45, met Novikov, 56, in 1967 while leading a study tour through the Soviet Union. She returned to visit him and they made plans to marry but Soviet officials refused to let Novikov leave. In 1979, Condon began lobbying for his release by writing letters and contacting politicians.

They were married May 28 in a backyard garden ceremony to the strains of "Laras' Theme" from the movie "Dr. Zhivago." They exchanged vows in Russian.

"We have always been in debt. We always spent more money than we took in and we always had to go in and scramble," McManus said.

Belmont town officials didn't return telephone calls yesterday.

News of the move prompted mixed reaction in Appleton.

Mayor Dorothy Johnson said she didn't think the fringe group would hurt the town's image, saying Appleton was diverse enough to allow all points of view.

But City Attorney Greg Carmen called the move unfortunate. He noted that annual memorial services are held at McCarthy's gravesite in town and a large bust of him is in the Outgamie County Courthouse, which could give Appleton the mistaken label of an ultra-conservative city.

"I don't think it's something where the community in general is going to get up in arms about it," he said. "That's not to say there isn't discomfort."

"We don't expect everyone to welcome us with open arms," McManus said. "But we mean him no harm nor do we mean harm to any American."

Welch, a candy maker, was one of 12 men who founded the society in 1958, convinced that leaders around the globe were secretly planning a world government controlled by a few powerful people. Communists, the society says, belong to a front group designed by the conspirators to give the impression there are two major types of governments in the world.

McManus said membership is in the "several tens of thousands."

In addition to debt, the group struggled internally over the question of how much to criticize President Reagan.

Atwater victimized by his creation

Resigns university post after student protest

WASHINGTON (AP) — Republican Party chairman Lee Atwater was portrayed Wednesday as a victim of the political symbolism of Willie Horton, the black convict Atwater turned into a major issue against Michael Dukakis in the 1988 presidential campaign.

Atwater resigned Tuesday night from the board of predominantly black Howard University after students occupied the administration building to protest his appointment.

"He masterminded the use of the Willie Horton issue to contribute to the rising anti-black sentiment of the American people," said Michael Lewis, a spokesman for the student group.

The vehemence of the student reaction against Atwater raised questions of how successful the new GOP chairman would be in achieving his goal of attracting black voters to the Republican Party.

However, there also was a view that President Bush has a very positive image among blacks, far more positive than that of his party or its chairman.

"The Republican Party as a whole has a pretty big image problems among blacks," said Linda F. Williams, an analyst with the Joint Center for Political Studies, an independent group that focuses on the black community.

"It is viewed as whether not interested in the problems of blacks or actually opposed to the advancement of blacks," she said.

"Bush has had a pretty long history with some black leadership," said Ms. Williams, "People are willing to see Bush as a moderate."

The president was flying to New York on Thursday to be keynote speaker at a United Negro College Fund banquet.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater told reporters that President Bush had "no reaction" to Atwater's decision to remove himself from Howard's board of trustees, when he defended Atwater's presence on the board.

"He hoped things would be worked out and they have been," Fitzwater said.

Since becoming chairman of the Republican National Committee early this year, Atwater, a South Carolina native who was Bush's campaign manager, has met with scores of black leaders as he has traveled around the country.

He attended a commemorative service in Atlanta on the anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther King Jr. An accomplished rhythm and blues guitarist, Atwater also has received widespread publicity performing with such black musicians as B.B. King.

Not all blacks endorsed the action of Howard students.

Alan Keyes, who was the Republican candidate for the Senate in Maryland in 1988, called the Howard protest "an unjustified reaction on the part of the students."

Keyes also disputed the contention that the Willie Horton ads were racist.

"When I look at Willie Horton, I see a criminal, I don't see a black person," he said.

Horton was a convicted murderer who failed to return from a weekend furlough from prison in Massachusetts and later raped a Maryland woman. The Bush campaign used ads featuring the Horton case to attack Democrat Dukakis as soft on crime.

Many Democrats, including Jesse Jackson, protested during the campaign that the Horton ads were racist.

"The signals that were sent in the Willie Horton ad were not so much about (prison) furloughs, but about race inciting fears in white people and creating very painful feelings among African-Americans," Jackson said yesterday.

"Unfortunately, Lee Atwater symbolizes the worst of that situation," said Jackson who called Atwater Tuesday night and urged him to resign from the board.

In his letter of resignation, the GOP chairman said he wanted to help the school, but "continuing the controversy surrounding my appointment any longer defeats that goal."

"Today's events at Howard demonstrate the possibility that someone could be injured in the protests," he said. "That I could not accept. I would never forgive myself if someone was hurt in one of these episodes."

"He feels this is an unjust situation," said Leslie Goodman, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

Michelle Stent, director of the Washington legislative office of the United Negro College Fund, said, "The college fund has a very close and good relationship with the president and his family."

Emphasizing that show was speaking as an individual and not for the fund, Ms. Stent said she could understand the student's viewpoint "because of the Willie Horton situation. ... I don't agree with what Mr. Atwater did personally, but politics is politics and he did what he had to do to win."

But, she added, "Maybe students are bringing us back to reality, that things have to be a little more honest."

It also warned Britons living in Lebanon to leave, saying they are under increased threat following Iran's severing of diplomatic ties with Britain on Tuesday. Three Britons are held hostage in Lebanon.

the foreign secretary, Sir Geoffrey Howe, announced the expulsions in the House of Commons. Britain also ordered the closing of the Iranian consulate in Hong Kong, a British colony, and gave the staff two weeks to leave, Howe said.

Government sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said up to 30 Iranians will be ordered to leave Britain.

Howe's comments came after an Iranian newspaper yesterday said the break in British-Iranian ties will adversely affect the British hostages in Lebanon. Also yesterday, a group holding two American hostages said it has completed plans to kill Rushdie, whose new book, "The Satanic Verses," led to the break.

Howe said the expulsion orders would be issued shortly. There are about 25,000 Iranians in Briton.

Khomeini sentenced Rushdie to death Feb. 14. Rushdie was born into a Moslem family in India and is a naturalized British citizen. He has been in hiding since the death order.

There are 15 hostages, including nine Americans, held in Lebanon. Terry Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for The Associated Press, is the hostage held longest. He was kidnapped March 16, 1985 and has been held longer than any hostage.

Athletic Association Championships, and the big EIGL meet at the end of the year.

Myers was the key figure in the UMass' success throughout last season. The Minutemen did not have the depth last year that they have this season.

At the beginning of the year, Johnson made a big move in redshirting John Eggers, Jay Ronayne, and Roberto Weil, all three of which were part of the starting lineup.

Myers contribution all of a sudden became a crucial factor to the team's prosperity.

"The team really counted on him last year," Johnson said.

Myers did not feel any pressure though. In fact he saw it as perhaps the turning point in his gymnastics career at UMass.

"I felt it was my turn to shine and to get my name known in our league because that's important," Myers said. "Judges, if they start to get to know you, they'll get to know where you score normally and that helps your score."

The judges got to know Myers and they apparently liked what they saw of the Middletown, N.J. native. Myers took over at the beginning of the season as the number one all-arounder for UMass and continued his success to the JMU meet.

But here's part two of the Tim Myers story: coming back from a serious injury. Knee injuries are often career threatening. The sight of an athlete clutching his knee after getting hurt is every coaches nightmare.

The senior year of a college athlete is supposed to be his time, a time to excel at his sport, rank on freshmen, and have a little fun. Myers had no intentions of missing that.

"Some say I had a quick recovery, quicker than most people," Myers said. "That's because I wanted to get back. This is my last year."

Since coming back, Myers has been the force that he was last year. In fact this could be even a better year for Myers.

"I guess I'm back to the same form as last year," Myers said. "I have better tricks."

With Ronayne, Eggers, and Weil back this year, along with a super freshman in Calvin Booker, the Minutemen have perhaps their best team ever. Last Saturday, with Myers leading the Minutemen in the all-around competition, UMass broke a school record for combined team score, a 268.05 which topped the previous mark of 267.25.

Johnson knew that Myers had the potential to reach the peaks that he has today.

"When Timmy puts his mind to something, he can do it," Johnson said. "But when he doesn't, he can't and that's more so with Timmy than anyone else."

As far as people who have had the most influence on getting him to where he is today in gymnastics, Myers points to his parents, but he also has respect for another person who has helped him get where he is today.

"I guess I'm considered a tough person to coach at times but Roy's coaching skills reach me," Myers said.

With the team currently in second place in the EIGL, there are only two obstacles standing in UMass' way for a league championship. They are Springfield College this weekend and the United States Naval Academy, the first-place team in the EIGL, which will be the Minutemen's biggest competition at the EIGL meet.

When Myers graduates in May, he plans to find a job in corporate fitness. But in the meantime he is concentrating on Springfield and the EIGLs, which will be held over Spring Break.

Myers does not plan on missing the EIGLs this time.

Rice has a happy birthday as Red Sox beat Twins

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — Jim Rice celebrated his 36th birthday by driving in three runs with a single and a double yesterday, lifting the Boston Red Sox to a 3-1 exhibition victory over the Minnesota Twins.

Rice singled in a run against 1988 American League Cy Young Award winner Frank Viola in the first inning and then doubled in two more against Balvino Valdex in the sixth.

In his second outing of the spring, Viola, 24-7 including two consecutive shutouts against Boston last year, went four innings, allowing one run and four hits.

Roger Clemens, the Cy Young winner in 1986 and '87 also made his second start, extending his shutout string to six innings. He worked out of a bases-loaded jam in the first, then retired after allowing three singles, striking out two and walking two in three innings.

Veterans Dennis Lamp and Bob Stanley followed Clemens with two scoreless innings apiece.

The Twins then capitalized on a break to avert a shutout against rookie Eric Hetzel in the eighth. John Moses got a triple when Carlos Quintana missed a diving catch attempt in right and scored on Gary Gaetti's sacrifice fly.

Relief ace Lee Smith completed a six-hitter for Boston, walking the first Batter in the ninth and then striking out the next three.

Ellis Burks led off the Boston first with a double into shallow left-center, took third on Marty Barrett's sacrifice and scored on Rice's looping line single to right.

Viola gave up two singles in the second but was helped by one of four Minnesota double plays.

He retired the last seven batters he faced in order, throwing just 36 pitches, 26 for strikes in four innings.

Galvez blanked Boston in the fifth, but Danny Heep started on Burks' bloop single to center. Rice scored both runners with a line double down the left-field line.

Rice and Heep had two hits apiece as the Red JSox improved their preseason record to 2-4. Minnesota dropped to 3-2.

Clemens, who needed just 23 pitches to retire nine batters in order against the Chicago White Sox last Thursday, had to work harder against the Twins.

He threw 52 pitches, including 38 strikes. However, 30 pitches were in the first inning, when the Twins hit a bunch of foul balls before he struck out Randy Bush to end the bases-loaded threat.

Clemens, who is not speaking to the media in spring training, worked easier in the second and the third.

"He had a good workout," Boston manager Joe Morgan said. "Gaetti gave him a battle before he walked [on the 10th pitch] to load the bases in the first. Then Bush struck out. That may have been the ball game right there.

"After he got through, Roger said that at the beginning he felt strong but at the end his legs felt like concrete, whatever that means. He'll probably go five innings next time out, at least four."

"He had good velocity, but he's still working on things," catcher Rich Gedman said. "He could throw the fastball all he wanted, but that's not what you want to do down here."

"He threw the ball much harder than he did last week," pitching coach Bill Fischer said. "They fouled off a lot of pitches and that's and indication that he was throwing hard. He also used all his pitches, mainly fastball, slider, and forkball."

Rice stung the ball both times after a small group of fans behind the dugout sang "Happy Birthday."

With one year left on a contract paying him $2.3 million this season, Rice has 10 hits, including two homers and two doubles, in 23 times at bat. He has driven in 10 runs in six games.

"I'm just swinging the bat, trying to be more aggressive," the 14 year veteran said.

Hawks soar over UMass in tourney, 78-48

Minutewomen remain winless vs. St. Joe's

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team was hoping maybe the third time would be the charm as it prepared to face St. Joseph's University last night at the Alumni Memorial Field House.

Having already been beaten by the Hawks twice this season, including an 82-60 loss last Saturday at the Curry Hicks Cage, the Minutewomen took the floor last night in the quarterfinal of the Atlantic 10 Tournament thinking that a new day and a change of scenery might make things different. As coach Kathy Hewelt had said before the game, "Anything can happen."

But the Minutewomen found out things don't change that drastically in only four days. St. Joseph's, the tournament's top seed, lived up to its billing and showed that the previous two meetings this season were the rule rather than the exception.

The Hawks punished the Minutewomen both inside and out and came away with a 78-48 win and a trip to the semifinals this weekend. UMass saw its season end with an 11-18 mark.

"We were pretty up to play St. Bonaventure, which was a big game for us," Hewelt said. "It was hard for us to get up again."

The Minutewomen were rendered helpless in trying to stop the main cog in the St. Joe's attack, 6-foot-1 junior center Dale Hodges, who finished with 15 points and a game-high 16 rebounds. The Hawks went right after the inside of the UMass lineup, successfully forcing Keyburn McCusker (team-high 16 points) and Helen Freeman (11 points, 10 rebounds) into serious foul trouble.

Both carried three personals into the second half, very much limiting the amount of defensive work they could do. St. Joe's got solid contributions from everyone, and with UMass able to dress only eight, it wasn't particularly deep at any position.

"We wanted to play St. Joe's hard, but they have a little too much of everything," Hewelt said. "We got into foul trouble inside, which is our Achilles heel."

With McCusker picking up her fourth foul early in the second half, that opened the door for Hodges and senior forward Kim Foley (game-high 21 points) to rip the Minutewomen apart inside.

Up 36-22 at the half, the Hawks cruised out of the locker room, never letting UMass get back within single digits. The Minutewomen were able to stay within range for the first eight minutes of the second half, but that was as far as it went.

UMass wore down quickly trying to stop the Hawks, who reeled off eight straight over a span of 1:31 to take a 58-36 lead with 10:31 left. It became painfully obvious that the hosts were going to run their lifetime record against UMass to a perfect 14-0.

"We didn't have that spark, but a major factor was energy," Hewelt said. "Our hustle was a half-step off and that's just fatigue."

On another note, UMass succeeded in controlling the St. Joe's hot shooting ways that proved so bothersome in last weekend's loss. The Hawks shot 45 percent from the floor last night.

But the difference turned out to be in UMass' shooting. It struggled all night and wound up with an icy 31 percent shooting effort, and also fumbled the ball over 20 times, including 15 in the first 20 minutes to help St. Joe's take control of game.

The teams seesawed through the first five minutes of the game before the Hawks finally took control. A Hodges free throw, a three-pointer by Foley and a steal and break by Rita Balaban in just over a minute gave the Hawks a 12-6 lead.

Shortly thereafter, Freeman picked up her third foul, forcing her to the bench and sophomore forward McCusker to the tough assignment of stopping Hodges. The Hawks continued to kill UMass on the boards, and with UMass going to a match-up zone to try and keep Hodges quiet, Foley took over for St. Joe's.

The senior forward had nine of her 15 first-half points in a 14-2 St. Joe's run that broke open a close game and helped the Hawks to a 36-22 lead at the break.

Even with the Minutewomen keeping close tabs on the dangerous Hodges, she still was able to shake free for seven points and 11 rebounds (six off the offensive glass) in the first half alone. Over the first 20 minutes, UMass was outrebounded 23-15.

UMass (48): Keyburn McCusker 7 15 2-2 16, Beth Wilbur 3 10 0-0 6, Helen Freeman 4 9 3-4 11, Dianne Burke 0 4 0-0 0, Trish Riley 3 11 0-1 6, Sue Serafini 1 6 2-2 4, Lisa Hair 0 5 1-2 1, Jenny Moran 2 3 0-0 4. Totals: 20-65 8-11 48.

St. Joseph's (78): Kim Foley 9 12 1-2 21, Jeanine Reynolds 1 5 2-2 4, Dale Hodges 6 17 3-4 15, Ellen Shields 7 12 0-0 15, Rita Balaban 2 5 0-0 5, Beth Supersky 1 7 0-0 3, Wendy Bronk 2 6 0-0 4, Margaret Bew 1 3 0-0 2, Maureen Dougherty 1 1 0-0 2, Alix Burns 0 2 0-0 0, Susie Dean 0 3 0-0 0, Liz Burns 1 2 0-0 2. Totals: 34 75 8-8 78

Three-point goals: UMass 0-9 (Riley 0-4, Serafini 0-2, Wilbur 0-1, Burke 0-1); St. Joe's 4-9 (Foley 2-2, Shields 1-3, Balaban 1-4).

Myers fights injury to regain old form for Eastern meet

Senior gymnast Tim Myers has succesfully come back from a knee injury to lead the Minutemen.

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

There are about 10 days to go before the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team storms upon Syracuse to try and capture the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League Championship.

Senior Tim Myers can remember quite well what happened to him 10 days before the EIGLs last season.

Myers was enjoying his best season as a Minuteman, leading UMass in the all-around competition in each meet. The EIGLs were going to be where he would really shine, showing off his talents to the rest of the league.

The Minutemen were engaged in a meet with James Madison University. Myers was the last competitor of the night in the last event, the high bar.

His routine was just about finished when, to the dismay of UMass coach Roy Johnson and the rest of the fans, Myers' knee gave out on his dismount because of the force of the landing.

UMass won the meet, but more importantly lost Myers for the rest of the season.

"Right after it happened, it didn't really hit me," Myers said. "I wasn't sure what was wrong with me. When the doctor said your finished, that devastated me. I was working all year for that one meet. My major goal in being in a college sport is to make a mark. And then that was all taken away."

Johnson was expecting his troops to finish third at the league championship last year, but without Myers the team plummetted to sixth. His value to the team became apparent.

Myers was awarded team Most Valuable Player for his effort last season despite missing a big meet with Springfield College at the end of the year, the East Coast

Senate rejects Tower, 53-47

From the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Democratic-controlled Senate yesterday rejected the nomination of former Texas Sen. John Tower as defense secretary, delivering a major rebuke to President Bush just 40 days into his term.

The Senate's 53-47 vote came after a bitter and divisive debate focusing on Tower's drinking habits, behavior toward women and his business dealings with defense contractors.

It was only the ninth time in 200 years that the Senate has voted to reject a president's Cabinet choice and the only time it has done so early in a new administration.

Vice President Dan Quayle presided over the Senate during the roll call, underscoring Bush's commitment to the nominee. The Senate galleries were packed and virtually all senators were in their seats as the roll was called.

"The nomination of John Tower to be secretary of defense is not confirmed," Quayle intoned after the vote.

Kansas GOP Sen. Nancy Kassebaum provided the biggest surprise of the final hours of debate when she became the sole Republican to declare her opposition.

She said her "most serious concerns" were over Tower's activities as a defense consultant after serving as an arms control negotiator. She also expressed doubts that he would pay enough attention to ensuring fairness for women in the military.

Tower's Republican defenders began to speak of him in the past tense and the nominee also appeared to accept defeat, even before the roll was called.

"Just moments ago I took a call from John Tower," said Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the senior GOP member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"His head is high, his voice is strong" Warner said. "He asked me to convey thanks — in his words — to the troops who rallied to his support."

SGA presidential candidates (l-r) Tracy Davis, Tom Darling, Morgan Hugo and Josh Gordon wait for last night's debate to begin. President and student trustee elections are Tuesday.

Candidates 'debate' the issues

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Presidential and student trustee candidates at the University of Massachusetts took advantage of their only major opportunity to address the student body before Tuesday's elections in a debate held last night in the Campus Center.

The 90-minute "debate" which was broadcast on WMUA and moderated by acting SGA President Robert Fadel, was more like a joint press conference as cross-debate was not permitted. Brief follow-up questions were allowed only after complaints from members of the four-person media panel.

The small audience was not allowed to question candidates during the forum because of time constraints imposed by WMUA, Fadel said.

Questions ranged from state budget cuts to more personal issues, including former Sen. Guy Glodis' denial that he was racist and opponent Sen. Josh Gordon's aversion of a question on why he attempted to transfer to Amherst College in 1988.

Sen. Tracy Davis, who also serves on the Board of Governors, said she was "the only candidate" to attend last Tuesday's rally against budget cuts at the Statehouse, and vowed to help students survive the cutbacks.

"I'm here for the job of president and not the title," Davis said. "What the next president is going to have to do is deal with the budget cuts."

Gordon said he would try to fight budget cuts, and would also attempt to increase recruitment of minority students by working with area high schools.

Glodis, in his second bid for SGA president, said he would refuse his salary, and cited textbook prices, alcohol policy and budget cutbacks as major issues in his platform.

Non-traditional student Cynthia Evans, 30, said she would advocate for women's issues and work against racism, sexism and homophobia on campus.

Candidates Morgan Hugo and Tom Darling spoke little during the forum, both claiming they are not going to win. Both, however, urged students to vote in the

Tough job? Yes, but UM lieutenant enjoys work

In the ground floor of Dickinson Hall, a tangerine scented candle burns next to a police scanner and a photo of Lt. Michael R. Grabiec Jr.'s family. An inscription on the photo's frame reads "A father considers his wealth not in possessions, but in the happiness of his family."

Grabiec was recently named deputy chief of the new Community Disorders Unit. Harassment associated with his job has forced him to be discreet about personal information pertaining to himself and his family, he said.

Death threats and a burning cross on his front lawn are among the experiences that have been part of his career as lieutenant. Such harassment is characteristic of the job, Grabiec said, but this does not prevent him from being fascinated by "everything" about police work.

"It's probably one of the best jobs around because you never do the same thing twice," he said. "You may have five larceny investigations in one day, but every larceny is different because you're working with different people, different suspects, different clues, different everything else."

Public Safety Director Arthur Hilson said he appointed Grabiec to head the unit because of his extensive experience as police officer and investigator.

PROFILE

"I believe he is the best qualified person for this important mission," Hilson said. "He will be an asset in our effort to eliminate and control crimes that occur in the community."

The unit, which was created by Hilson, investigates incidents of "violence, threats or harassment," Grabiec said. Sexual assaults, drug trafficking, juvenile crimes and VIP protection are among the duties of the unit, he said.

Date rape rallied against

Groups rally against date rape at SU

By DANIELLE BIONDA

The Everywoman's Center and the Greek Area joined forces for Sexual Assault Awareness Day yesterday at a noon rally inside the Student Union Building.

More than 150 supporters and passers-by silently listened as Educator/Advocates from the EWC retold women's date rape experiences and recited statistics. One of four college women has been raped or been a victim of attempted rape, they said.

Amer Syed, vice president of the Interfraternity Council, said, "We're here to show support and also concern that the negative stereotypes of the Greeks are not perpetuated."

"This isn't just a one-day event," said Kevin "Hollywood" Taylor, a social chairman of Delta Upsilon. "We know date rape can happen at any time."

"I have had two girlfriends that had been raped and one of them was raped on campus," he said.

Taylor said the council decided two weeks ago to wear their fraternity letters to the rally and support the Everywoman's Center. "We are going to be here in numbers today," he said.

Five to 10 members of each fraternity and sorority attended the rally, said Milind Bharvirkar, president of the Interfraternity Council.

The Greeks hung signs and made buttons while the Educator/Advocates passed out "no means no" balloons, rape whistles with prevention education and date rape crisis phone numbers and information on sexual assault.

At noon, supporters blew whistles to signal the beginning of the Speak Out. As onlookers grew silent, eight Educator/Advocates began to recount true stories about date rape survivors.

One speaker said rape is committed with the genitals, but it is not sex, and she explained, "If I hit you over the head with a frying pan, would you call it cooking?"

The speakers said that the major motivation for rape is anger, hostility and aggression — not sex.

The Speak Out, which lasted for 20 minutes, incorporated views about sexual assault, safety on campus and pornography.

The Educator/Advocates urged everyone to "turn on the lights and for your life's sake see," and called for all women to be

Decoy treatment may prevent common cold

BOSTON (AP) — A newly discovered chemical decoy may lure the common cold virus away from its targets inside the nose, perhaps providing the First medicine to prevent the sniffles, scientist said yesterday.

The research hopes unravel the strategy used by rhinoviruses — the culprits in about help of all colds — to get into the cells that line the nose and begin the all-too familiar bouts of hacking, sneezing and snuffing.

While the research provides tanatilizing clues for developing ways to prevent the common cold, scientists caution that such treatments are still years away. Even if they prove effective, they will only work against the Rhinoviruses, not other cold viruses, and probably won't cure colds once they start.

"This is not a cure. It is a scientific step," said Dr. Michael E. Kamarck of Molecular Therapeutics, one of two research groups that simultaneously made made the discovery.

The two teams provided the first detailed descriptions of the rhinovirus receptor, the minuscule spots on cells where rhinoviruses attach themselves.

Researchers speculate that by flooding the nose with synthetic copies of this natural molecule, it should be possible to hopelessly confuse attacking viruses, luring them away from susceptible cells. A similar strategy is already being tested in a far more serious disease, AIDS.

Scientists said the new approach to preventing cold infections succeeds in the test tub but has not been tried yet on people. "If it works, it would be very exciting," commented Dr. Richard Crowell, a virus researcher at Hahnemann University School of Medicine in Philadelphia.

Reports on the two teams' conclusions were published in Friday's issue of the journal Cell. One study was conducted at the Harvard-affiliated Center for Blood Research in Boston and Boehrihnger Ingelheim Pharmaceuticals in Ridgefield, Conn., and the other at Molecular

TEAM works for tax reform

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

HOLYOKE — Tax increases may be a feasible alternative to a "nightmare" House Ways and Means Committee budget, said Susan Romaine, assistant director of the Tax Equity Alliance for Massachusetts.

Romaine and Christopher Crowley, an organizer of TEAM, told an audience of about 50 yesterday at Holyoke Community College that there are alternatives to the "No new taxes" budget proposed by the Massachusetts House Ways and Means Committee. Romaine said, "We are looking for ways to shore up lagging revenues."

TEAM was formed in 1987 to "educate people on the need for fair tax reform," Crowley said.

"When the word taxes comes up, people think we're going after their wallets," he said, adding that's not always the case.

"The budget has been a nightmare for the state, but a blessing in disguise for us." Romaine said the budget controversy has helped generate media attention for TEAM.

"There is a $636 million deficit in the state budget this year," Romaine said. TEAM attributes the deficit to Proposition 2 1/2, which was implemented in 1981.

"As a result of Proposition 2 1/2, municipalities had trouble providing services, so the states had to step in to fill the void. Since 1981, local aid has doubled," she said.

Since the House budget promises no new taxes, substantial cuts to services provided by the state must be made to raise revenue, she said. Funding for many state-run programs and public education are among the human services affected by the cuts, she said.

TEAM sees progressive tax reform as an alternative to cutting services. They said they believe the elimination of capital-gains deductions as a means of reform.

"By eliminating the capital-gains deduction, the state could gain $360 million in revenue that could be used for critical programs that are vastly underfunded," Romaine said.

OHHHHHHH — Jan Willner tries to shake off Wednesday night yesterday morning at the Brigham's in Holyoke.

Capital gains is a form of unearned income received when a person sells real estate, stocks and other forms of capital. There is a 10 percent tax on the income from the sale, but a 50 percent tax deduction is given to the consumer, Romaine said. Ultimately, the person ends up paying only a five percent tax, he said.

Crowley said, "This is not an outrageous proposal. In 1986, the Reagan administration eliminated capital-gains deductions on the federal level. Since 1986, 28 out of the 36 states [which had capital gains deductions] eliminated the breaks."

He said it is important "to get people to realize that the capital gains proposal is not an attack." 90 percent of the people who benefit from capital gains are among the richest 10 percent of the population, he said.

Romaine said, "The state doesn't tax food for pelt-producing animals. The state [subsidizes] the fur industry. This $2 million could provide home care for 1,500 elderly people in the state."

Jon Hallett, a "concerned taxpayer" said, "Tax reform must be put in terms so people understand that without an increase in taxes, it may take the fire department 20 minutes to arrive, and their house may not be saved, or it may take a half hour for the police to arrive, if they can fit the call in at all."

University Without Walls opens doors for adults

By DEBORAH RITTER
Collegian Staff

After 12 years as a news editor for Amherst radio station WTT, Thomas Ashwell, 41, decided the time had come to return to college and finish his degree.

Today, a 1988 graduate of the University of Massachusetts' University Without Walls program, Ashwell is working for his Master's in American History.

"I didn't think I needed a traditional undergraduate program," he said. "I just wanted to tie up loose ends and go on to grad school."

Traditional is not an adjective ordinarily used to describe UWW. Created in 1971 "out of the political energy of the 1960s," UWW makes UMass accessible to adults who cannot do it any other way, said UWW Director Gary Bernhard.

"We're a court of last resort," said Ed Harris, former UWW Director. "We require applicants to investigate other options first, and if they find that for reasons of job or parental responsibilities they cannot fit in a normal curriculum, we will consider them."

As adults are enrolling in colleges in record numbers across the country, UWW is deliberately being kept small, Bernhard said. For the last ten years, enrollment in UWW has remained steady at 300, he said.

"The size of UWW could easily be doubled or even quadrupled," Bernhard said. "But like everyone else we've had to absorb our share of budget cuts."

"Over the years," he said, "UMass has maintained a steady level of commitment to the program, but it has never been willing to go beyond that point, despite our best efforts."

Harris said adult education is vital for the entire state.

> "We're a court of last resort."
> –Ed Harris

"The Massachusetts economy is so dependent on a well-educated work force," he said. "That's what high-tech businesses look for when they move here."

According to Ed Andrews, regional manager of the Council for Adult and Experiential Learning, "Many traditional jobs can no longer be filled with just a high school education. Even a clerk needs to know how to use a computer these days."

A greater demand for certification in various professions is another reason why adults return to school, Andrews said.

"You used to be able to run a day care center in a spare room," he said. "Now you need to be certified."

About 7 percent of the UMass undergraduate population is over the age of 25, according to the Office of Planning and Development. Most of these students make sacrifices to fit into a traditional academic setting, Harris said, adding that more adults would return to school if they were offered more options.

The most common point of re-entry for adults is Continuing Education programs at state schools, he said. Because such programs receive no state subsidy, they discriminate against adults, Harris said.

"Massachusetts is the only state that makes adults pay for education," he said. "The services offered are limited to the amount of fees generated. That means adults are shortchanged on the advising and support services they badly need."

Community colleges typically have large adult populations, he said. Both Bernhard and Harris said it should be possible for students to complete most of their coursework at community colleges and through independent study.

Massachusetts should follow the example of states like New York, Illinois and California, which have UWW-type

Graduate employees to protest fee

The Graduate Employee Organization has scheduled a protest on the Student Union steps today to protest "an appalling lack of serious commitment to public higher education on the part of the state," according to a rally organizer.

Mike Parkhurst, GEO spokesperson, said in a written statement, "We are outraged at the addition this semester of yet another 'one-time' fee to cover University expenses: the $50 'curriculum fee.'"

The GEO is a 600-member organization that for the past year has attempted to organize a graduate employee union to seek better wages and working conditions.

According to Parkhurst, the GEO is unhappy with the "University administration's poor handling of the [state's lack of commitment]."

The protest is scheduled to begin at noon on the Student Union steps with a procession led around campus by two GEO members, he said.

According to Parkhurst, the GEO members will be pushing wheelbarrows filled with pennies to pay the $50 fee. The wheelbarrows will be pushed to the Bursar's office in the Whitmore Administration Building, where the fee will be paid, he said.

"The pennies are meant to symbolize the precarious financial situation of graduate employees, and to dramatize the need for a union to combat such fees in the future," he said.

"We think it is inexcusable to expect students to foot the bill for the fiscal incompetence of the governor and the legislature," Parkhurst said.

Man denies drug charges

Rogers pleads innocent to trafficking

A third man suspected to be involved in trafficking cocaine to University of Massachusetts students denied drug charges in Hampshire Superior Court Tuesday.

Louis J. Rogers, 19, of Springfield, pleaded innocent to a grand jury indictment charging him with two counts of cocaine trafficking.

Judge John F. Murphy set bail for Rogers at $1,500 for his alleged involvement in two drug transactions, one in Hadley on Jan. 18 and the second in Amherst Feb. 8.

Rogers and two others were arrested at the Price Chopper Supermarket on University Drive during an alleged drug deal by a state police drug task force working with UMass and Amherst police. The other two men with Rogers, William Tripp III and Kwasi Oduro-Tandoh, were arrested after allegedly selling about four ounces of cocaine to undercover narcotics officers.

Both Tripp and Oduro-Tandoh's bails were set at $10,000 while Rogers was released on his own recognizance.

Police reported they confiscated between $30,000 and $45,000 worth of rock-form cocaine at the time of arrest.

Rogers contends he was shopping at the time of the transaction and had given the other two men and a female UMass student a ride to the store from the University. The woman was neither held for or charged with any crime.

Roger's car was confiscated by state police officers in order to determine the extent of his involvement in the crime. He is scheduled for pre-trial hearing conference April 3.

programs operating on a statewide basis, Harris said. Besides its Amherst location, UWW has locations in Springfield and Worcester.

Classes need to be offered at realistic times, Andrews said. He cited the example of Keene State College, which holds classes on weekends.

In many cases, it may not be necessary to attend classes. New York and New Jersey have examination systems that enable adults to earn all or most of a degree by passing a series of tests.

"It's extremely efficient," Harris said. "If someone already has expertise in a particular area, why should that person waste his time and the state's resources by sitting in class?"

Harris said he is optimistic about the recent appointment of Paul Tsongas as chairman of the Massachusetts Board of Regents of Higher Education.

"When the Regents examine the long-range needs of the Commonwealth," he said, "I hope adults figure prominently in their thinking. To do otherwise would be very short-sighted."

The six student trustee candidates focused on similar issues, each promising to lobby the 19 members of the UMass Board of Trustees in Boston, three of whom are students from state schools.

Candidate Rob Skelton, who played the harmonica during the forum, vowed to "lobby like hell" for students and cited his founding of a newspaper as the basis for his qualifications.

Eric Nakajima, BOG chairperson, said, "We need to make sure that the trustees know exactly how policies are affecting us."

Candidates Al Arpad and Sandy Edwards both emphasized communication to the students, through newsletters or editorials in the Collegian.

"The trustee should let students know what's going on," Edwards said. "They have as much of a say as any member of that board."

Bob Monaghan, one year shy of the legal drinking age, said laws preventing minors from drinking alcohol in Massachusetts are wrong and said he wants to revive tailgating on campus.

Rich Barry, who arrived wearing a bathrobe and different colored socks, said he was not interested in winning, but urged students to vote and "laugh."

"We investigate all crimes against race, color, sex, religion, creed, age and national origin," he said.

The unit consists of Grabiec and officers Daniel Hagan and Joanne O'Connor. Hilson said he hopes to add at least one more officer to the CDU by next month.

The 46-year-old lieutenant is heavy-set with graying temples. His harsh tone is softened by a genial attitude and an argyle sweater. Grabiec will divulge that he is married, has four children and is originally "from the area." He refused to have his photo taken.

Before coming to the University, Grabiec was a retail manager and security consultant for the J.J. Newberry Co.

"One of the very important things — it was a growing field — was stealing, quite a popular thing. It was taking more of the profits out of businesses," he said.

Grabiec, who has worked part-time in a community police force, said working on a campus is "more of a challenge."

"I find people in communities are sometimes more cooperative because you have older people. There is a lot of peer pressure on campus," he said.

For all its shortcomings, however, Grabiec considers the Amherst area an ideal place to work and raise a family.

That much he could say.

ed to repair damage caused by the bitter struggle to relations between the Senate and President Bush.

"I know what's in my heart and in my mind," he told reporters. "I want to directly, clearly and unambiguously say that this doesn't represent an effort to be harmful to the president."

Dole agreed to a late-afternoon vote on the nomination after acknowledging the collapse of a last-minute bid to give Tower an extraordinary 6-month trial period as defense secretary to prove he could abstain from drinking.

"When he made his decision all the other Democrats wheeled in behind him," said Sen. John Chafee, R-R.I.

Names most frequently mentioned in White House speculation as a replacement for Tower are Warner, a former secretary of the Navy; former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld; former Rep. Jack Edwards, R-Ala.; and national security adviser Brent Scowcroft.

Goodell Library target of second bomb scare

The second bomb threat in three days to the University of Massachusetts was received by the building's personnel yesterday, again calling a halt to activities inside for four hours.

A desk worker in Goodell Library, sight of the previous threat, told police the threat came by telephone shortly after 12:15 p.m. and spoke of an explosive device somewhere in the building.

The building was evacuated as UMass police and the Environmental Health and Safety department performed a search which failed to produce the alleged bomb.

Jack Luippold, deputy chief of UMass Public Safety, said the latest threat might be linked to the previous one, but also said the investigation was an ongoing one and details concerning evidence could not be revealed.

Police took statements from the library staff about the incident.

A bomb threat was telephoned in to the library Monday afternoon, to which Amherst Fire Department responded and performed a search of the premises.

At that time Arthur Hilson, director of Public Safety, said he had no reason to believe the bomb scare was anything but a threat.

Graduate Senate says Board of Governors biased

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Reacting to recent Graduate Student Senate charges of "favoritism and unprofessional conduct" by the Board of Governors' Space Committee, the BOG announced last night that they have begun an internal review of that group's record.

"We're just basically going to find out if their charges are substantiated or not," said Governor Scott Jordan, who has been tapped by BOG Chairman Erik Nakajima to head the investigation.

At Tuesday night's Graduate Student Senate meeting a motion surfaced — and was quickly tabled — that charges the BOG with failing to satisfy the space needs of graduate student organizations and "to deal with the issues of the Minuteman and UMass Republican Club."

"The Graduate Student Senate will no longer participate in the Board of Governors and withdraws its support until these issues are resolved," reads the motion, which also mentioned an alleged verbal assault of a senator by a governor.

The GSS is not expected to act on the proposal until their next meeting, following spring break.

Sources close to the BOG described the wording of the allegations as "fuzzy," adding that "it is not clear what was their intent" in threatening to withdraw support.

"They would probably pull out their appointed representatives," said Jordan, "and their money." As the GSS is under contract for financial support of the BOG, added Jordan, "that would open up a whole can of worms that we really don't want to get into."

safe.

"There must be a lot of women who are afraid to say anything," said senior Debbie Thompson, a classics major. She said she came to the rally with a friend and was surprised at the large turnout.

"It's really nice to see so many men are supporting [the rally]," Thompson said.

"I think something like this [rally] is very important for everyone," said senior French major Louise Houle, "especially for people who have been date-raped."

Thompson and Houle agreed that the rally made it especially clear that women should not blame themselves for date rape. "It's definitly not their fault," Houle said. "And that's why awareness is important."

Junior communications major Richard Cadiz said he didn't know about the rally, but stopped to listen when he passed through the Student Union Building.

"I stopped when I saw so many people here listening to the [Educator/Advocates]," he said. "It was interesting, and it makes people more aware of what date rape is."

Gretchen Krull, a coordinator of Peer Sexuality Education at University Health Services, and an organizer of the event, said she was "very pleased" with the Blow the Whistle on Date Rape rally.

"I was impressed that so many people stopped and seemed supportive," she said. "It was definitely a success."

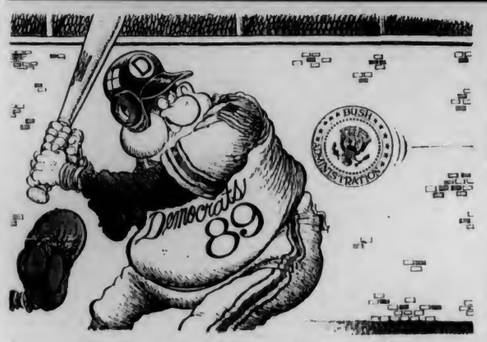
EDITORIAL/OPINION



Lawbreaking in the Valley

The law is a funny thing.

Each night's news brings questions from the courtrooms of America. Questions of whether criminals can plead insanity, or guilty, or anything to get a lesser charge. Questions of whether it's proper for company after company to avoid losing millions in lawsuits, because they have more money to spend on legal protection.

David R. Mark

We read in the newspapers about police officers turned crooked, of streets controlled by gangs, and of the resultant killing of officer after officer. Then we have questions of search warrant violations, and vigilantism, and other unfortunate incidents that bring us back to the courtrooms on television.

And then there are those who violate the law and don't care.

But I'm not just talking about hoodlums in our inner-cities, and I'm not talking about such minor things as speeding and parking tickets, or shoplifting at Price Chopper.

No, we have people willfully violating the law — which perhaps they feel they are above — in the Happy Valley. Let me give an example:

I was at McManus' with another reporter last Saturday night, a little past midnight. As we walked in, we couldn't help but notice three cars parked in the fire lane in front of the diner, including two Hadley police cars.

Once inside the diner, I saw two Hadley police officers drinking coffee at the counter near the entrance. I went over, and in my most friendly and innocent voice, asked one officer if there was a reason for the obvious parking violation.

"This is private property," she said. "If there is a problem, the owner of this restaurant can have the cars towed."

"Is that a problem?" she added.

No, I grumbled. I smiled, thanked her for her time, and went outside again.

With a little checking, the Collegian found out, in fact, that parking in a fire lane is illegal. No great shock, except to certain Hadley officers.

Since the officers saw nothing wrong with parking in a fire lane where it clearly said NO PARKING, I decided to write down the license plate numbers and the car numbers on the side of the vehicles.

They are respectively:

- License plate numbers 3699 and 2287.
- Vehicle numbers 35 and 36.

Human nature is equally funny.

The police cars left, it seemed, within seconds of my writing down the numbers. As they sped off, to my surprise, two other cars pulled into the fire lane.

"Fire lane," I said, pointing to the fire lane as the first person got out of his car.

"I know," he replied, and walked into the restaurant.

To my shock (although they were only following each other's lead, starting with the two police officers), seven non-police cars parked in the fire lane within one half hour.

It may be small-town news to many of you, but there is a principle at stake here. Be it parking in a fire lane or selling heroin on the streets, police officers are to respect and, more important, enforce the law.

Anything short of that is irresponsible, and the officers at question here should be reprimanded, just as quickly as any other officer breaking any other law should be reprimanded.

And at least two Hadley officers provided "anything short of that" last Saturday night in front of McManus'.

Get Coca-Cola out of South Africa

"You are either alive and proud or you are dead, and when you are dead, you can't care anyway," explained Stephen Biko in June of 1977. Three months later, Stephen Biko was dead.

The South African government claimed that he died of a hunger strike while in police custody. In reality, Stephen Biko was tortured and beaten to death by members of the South African Security Police.

David Eng

"I have cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society in which all persons live together in harmony and with equal opportunities. It is an ideal which I hope to live for and to achieve. But if need be, it is an ideal for which I am prepared to die," explained Nelson Mandela in 1964.

For the last 25 years, Nelson Mandela had been imprisoned by the South African government for these very same ideals. In all likelihood, Nelson Mandela will die before he sees these ideals achieved.

"Apartheid is not simply a regrettable localized aberration of importance only to South Africa. It is a universal moral crisis and no nation can in conscience stand back and adopt a neutral or passive attitude to it. Apartheid is an affront to every single member of the family of humanity," explained Donald Woods, a white South African newspaper editor and a friend of Stephen Biko's.

So now it's up to you. Are you willing to do something to end the injustice in South Africa? What can you do? It's very simple. Boycott.

Coca-Cola, along with other US companies, does business in South Africa because it's profitable. Coke executives claim that they are helping the Black people of South Africa by giving them jobs. Could this be true?

Before he was killed Stephen Biko said, "If Washington wants to contribute to the development of a just society in South Africa, it must discourage investment in South Africa. We Blacks are perfectly willing to suffer the consequences. We are quite accustomed to suffering."

So, once again, it's up to you. Are you willing to suffer a little bit to help the 23 million Blacks suffering under Apartheid? Are you willing to do your part in ending the injustice in South Africa? Are you willing to further the cause that Stephen Biko died for?

Your part is a simple one:

1) Don't buy any Coca-Cola products

2) Write a letter to the Coca-Cola corporation (Public Relations Dept.; -1 Coca-Cola Plaza; Atlanta, GA 30313) telling them that you won't buy any Coke products until they get the hell out of South Africa.

And that's it. It's that simple. By taking part in this nation-wide boycott, we can send a message to corporate America, The people of this country will no longer tolerate the million dollar profits at the expense of human lives. We won't "Catch the Wave" as long as that wave is breaking the backs of the 23 million Blacks in South America.

Giving more than just blood

I've been converted.

I've always tried to keep my morals on a practical level, one on which I could relate. Problems in the rest of the world didn't affect me so there was no real point worrying about those problems, for then I might have to think about them. So war raged in Central America, thousands upon thousands of people in this country were left out in the cold with nowhere to go, even more thousands of people in Africa died of starvation and I was oblivious to all — wallowing in my own blissful ignorance.

On February 28, I did a small thing. I wore as I wrote this, a little sticker that says, "Be Nice To Me — I Gave Blood" along with a little blood-drop pin to show that I was a first-timer in the blood doner world. As I waited in line after answering all the questions they so carefully and thoughtfully asked me about my previous illnesses, sexual practices, and so on, I looked around the room in which I was to perform one of the few acts I have ever done for the good of my fellow man.

An as I looked around I saw the faces of the others in the room with me — some of them first-timers too. What I carried in my own heart I think I saw in their faces. We all realized, subconciously or otherwise, that the problems of the world were so incredibly large that us being there on that day couldn't possibly amount to anything in the general scheme.

But walking out of the room afterwards I thought again. I remembered that I signed a card saying that I wanted my blood to be given to a man carrying poison from the deadly Agent Orange in his veins, which he contracted during Vietnam. So I was helping one person. I realized at that's all we really can do.

So war rages in Central America, thousands of people are homeless in this country, even more die of starvation in Africa, and I gave blood. Even when put into that huge context, it doesn't sound half bad. So be nice to me, I gave blood.

Budget cuts show hypocrisy in state government

When the big ax of the budget cutters finally stops swinging and the fallout from the State's recent revenue shortfall is complete, some ugly truths will be only too evident

Among these will be just what a sharp and nervy little bugger the Duke really is. The audacity of his presidential run is staggering. Massachusetts was piling up a debt of $604 million while he ran a campaign based on "competence." It is a frightful day for our country when a $604 million dollar deficit is viewed as competence.

Of course, his was not even the most glaring hypocrisy in the race, not with the ex-director of the CIA clamoring for kindness and gentleness. But regardless of Bush's senseless blatherings, the fact remains: a five-foot six lump of blue suit, nostrils, eyebrows and arrogance almost came up with four years worth of free plane rides on Air Force One running a campaign based on competence — while his home state was running up huge debts.

Dukakis's competence is being roundly criticized now that the revenue shortfalls have become publically evident, and his presidential aspirations have failed. Ironically, much of this criticism is coming from a group which was silent during the Duke's bid for the presidency — the State Legislature.

This is our second Ugly Truth — a good number of our Legislators are shameless opportunists and backstabbers.

Like hyenas, sensing their prey's weakness, the critics in the legislature are all too eager to rip Dukakis now that he is a lame-duck governor. But they didn't have anything to say when it looked like the Duke was going to be sitting pretty in the Big House on Pennsylvania Avenue, and I don't believe they were suffering from laryngitis. Their vocal difficulties stemmed from a deeper problem: spinelessness.

William Gorman

These jellyfish who flowed with the current while Dukakis was front-runner have now turned their stings on him. This is because their only sense of direction comes from the tide of public opinion which has now risen against Dukakis.

The cart is squarely in front of the horse in our Legislature. Our "leaders" wet their fingers and gauge the winds of public sentiment deciding whether to wear Green Lantern or Batman Underoo's. There are critically few legislators whose foresight extends past tomorrow's headlines, and this is going to cost us. With no one willing to battle for "unpopular" positions, we are trumpeted by the headline mongers and get rammed through.

It's happening now, with the State budget. "Mad Dog" Richard Voke, half-crazed by ambition, power lust, and the warm glow of television lights on his cheeks, has proposed a frighteningly regressive budget which is being seriously considered by the rest of the legislature.

Voke is the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee who can be heard, even in his sleep, raging "No new taxes!" with the fervor and conviction of a religious fanatic. In order to toe the "no new taxes" mark, Voke has indiscriminately slashed and chopped state expenditures in his budget.

Among the expenditures, Voke has deemed expendable and hacked from his proposed budget millions of dollars for the state's higher education system which is already in a crisis situation from the budget cuts of the past two years. Worse, Voke has completely wiped out the higher education library funding budget. He made this cut because he feels that the library funding should come from the regular higher education budget. This would be fine except that the regular budget is already decimated without the additional eight million burden of sustaining the libraries. Voke didn't shift the money from one budget to the other — he literally eradicated it.

If these cuts go through, not only are students presently enrolled in the state colleges and universities screwed, the entire future of higher education in Massachusetts is going to be irreparably damaged. And that's the Ugly Truth

Therapeutics of West Haven, Conn., part of Miles Inc., a pharmaceutical firm.

"It is clearly feasible to develop a treatment based on what we have learned," said Dr. Timothy A. Springer of the Center for Blood Research. He described the work as "an important scientific breakthrough."

Springer said his group has already produced a soluble form of the virus receptor, but they are attempting to develop a version that will be even more effective as a virus-fooling drug.

Experts predicted that such a treatment would probably be used as a nose spray or drops. Since it would be impractical — and probably expensive — to use the drops daily, people might take the medicine when they are especially worried about getting colds.

For instance, parents might take the treatment to protect themselves when their child brings home a cold. Or an athlete might use it to keep from catching a cold before an important game.

"Whether it would cure a cold once it started is not clear," said Springer. "I doubt it. It might help a cold clear up more quickly."

Springer has worked for several years on a structure on the surface of cells called intercelular adhesion molecule-1, or ICAM-1.

Unsubstantiated Rumors, Etc.

Two weeks ago, we went to the Kaufman Studios in Astoria, New York, to interview someone closely involved in the production of the new film, Disco II: The Revenge. What follows will be, we hope, an informative and entertaining look at the making of a major Hollywood production. Before we begin, however, we would like to thank the interviewee, Mr. Arlyn Jacobs, for his time and good humor. He is truly one of the great unsung heroes of the film industry.

THE SCREENING ROOM

ADAM CAMPBELL: Thanks for the coffee.
ARLYN JACOBS: No problem.
JIM COLE: Really, no offense, but what exactly does a Gaffer do?
A.J: It's all right. I get it all the time. I'm sort of a technical engineer.
A.C.: Technical engineer. What exactly does that mean?
A.J: I oversee a lot of the technical work on the set. I do have some people that work under me. And together we handle a lot of the independent systems that work together during production.
J.C.: Such as. . . ?
A.J.: I don't really have a lot of time.
A.C.: Okay. Let's talk about the movie. I understand there's a lot of money being poured into this. Do you think it's kind of a risky project? I mean, disco. . . ?
A.J.: Every film is a risky project. You remember what William Goldman said.
A.C.: Who?
A.J.: He said, "nobody knows anything." Nobody knows if their film is going to be a hit or a bomb.
J.C.: But, disco?
A.J.: Look, everything is cyclical. In the last couple of years, bell-bottoms and polyester have been coming back. Disco can't be far behind. Duct knows what they're doing.
A.C.: Duct?
A.J.: What?
A.C.: You said "Duct."
A.J.: Duck. Duck Pictures. I didn't say "duct."
J.C.: There've been a lot of rumors about the casting. At some point, Sylvester Stallone was interested, but he backed out and the part was re-written for Nastassia Kinski. Is that right?
A.J.: Boy, who are your sources? It was written for John Travolta.
A.C.: He's in it?
A.J.: No.
The interview will be concluded in an upcoming issue.

Local restaurant offers readings

By REBECCA MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Marcie's Place, located at 30 Boltwood Walk in Amherst on the ground floor of what used to be Plunbley's, is more than just a restaurant. In addition to serving what she describes as "hearty, homestyle cooking" and an assortment of baked goods from a menu which changes on a regular basis, owner Marcie Abramson strives to make the space available for the artists in the community.

The restaurant is fairly new, having only been around for about six months. "We often have acoustic music and local musicians play a lot," said Abramson, but there is no set day. People come and play whenever they are around and have time, she said. A textile show at the restaurant is also in the planning.

This month, Marcie's Place is featuring readings of fiction and poetry by local writers. Abramson said she likes to encourage local writers to take advantage of the space to read their works and plans to hold more readings in the future. The readings have received a good turnout and a good response from the public so far, Abramson reported, adding that the Amherst Writers and Artists Guild has also shown support.

For the month of March three more readings are scheduled, all at 3pm. Today there will be fiction readings by Sarah Buttenweiser and Sarah Galdston. March 18 there will be readings of poetry by Mary Fister and fiction by Peter Nelson, and March 25 there will be poetry readings by Gene Zeiger and fiction by Robin Lewis.

Abramson hopes to have events listed in the calendar sections of local papers in the future, but said any one interested in what is going on should feel free to call the restaurant for information.

"It's a nice place to come mid-afternoons from 2-5pm to study, to have meetings, to chat with friends; a nice place for that kind of activity," added Abramson, who said students are always welcome. Marcie's Place is open from 11am-9pm Tues. through Saturday.

Shephard plays address nukes

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

This weekend you still have the chance to see Smith College Theatre Department's production of the Sam Shepard plays, Action and Icarus's Mother, directed by Mark Harrison.

I went to see the show when it opened last Thursday and, I must say, I was mucho impressed.

The two plays are in some way concerned about nuclear Armageddon. Action seems to be set in a post-nuclear holocaust scenario - something like Ridley Walker without the barbarism. We discover the protagonists, Louis, Shooter, Jeep and Lyle Removed from the context of history (symbolised in the play by a book in which they have lost the place) and the outside world, they are forced to redefine themselves through their actions. As the play progresses, each character seems to withdraw from an initial sense of community into their own solipsistic universe, bound together only by the tangible, concrete realities of action and their effects, and a mutual desire to survive, to somehow exist.

Icarus's Mother although having a more recognisably contemporary setting, is also surrounded by an air of unreality. Here, five friends make a trip to the beach to witness the 4th of July firework display. Everything goes well until the appearance of a jet plane in the sky triggers a chain of events which alters the group's relationship. they begin to lie to each other for no visible reason, but all these betrayals are in someway connected with the plane.

The common theme that seems to run through both plays is that of the symbolic splitting of the atom, how in the shadow of the nuclear age society itself has become sub-atomic. One of the questions Icarus's Mother raises is a historical one - What is it that determines man's desire to "fly too close to the sun?" Who or what is Icarus's Mother?

The ensemble casts are excellent, you really feel that the actors are creating their characters within the performance. Particularly worth mentioning are James Malloy and Brian Smith who show great versatility, appearing in both plays. And Dan Rists sets are effective in their economy and creative use of space.

Action/Icarus's Mother will be at Theater 14, Smith College until Sunday. Show begins 8 p.m.

Die Walkure at FAC

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

One of the most memorable scenes on film occurs in Apocalypse Now when Robert Duvall blasts "The Rite of the Walkure" from the loudspeaker of an army helicopter.

The piece he used to intimidate Vietnamese villagers is from Die Walkure, the second opera in the Ring of the Nebelungen tetralogy by Richard Wagner (pronounced Vog-ner). The Five-College Orchestra, conducted by Dennis Burkh, will present two performances of the opera's first act this weekend at the University of Massachusetts and Amherst College.

Three guest vocalists will accompany the orchestra: David Cumberland, Elizabeth Mannion and Edward Sooter. Cumberland's renowned bass has been heard regularly in Germany, Switzerland and Austria. Mannion, a soprano who has been performing Wagner's work for over 20 years, is considered one of the best vocal instructors in the nation. Sooter has been a tenor in New York's Metropolitan Opera for a decade and has been a guest performer in Cologne's Wagner repertoire.

Tonight's production will take place in the Fine Arts Center at 8 p.m. Sunday, the orchestra will pack its gear and head over to Buckley Recital Hall for a 3 p.m. performance.

For the serious Wagnerhead, there will be two lectures this weekend as well. Tonight at 7 p.m., University Music Professor Charles Heffernan will speak in Bezanson Recital Hall while musicologist Philip Gossett can be seen in Amherst College Music Department, room 5, just before Sunday's performance.

For more information, call the FAC Box Office, 545-2511.

5th Business slowly on rise

By ARI VAIS
Collegian Staff

UMass has quite a few bands - there's always someone booked into the Hatch. A good amount of the students here boast that they are musicians . . . don't be intimidated - 90 of these "bands" sound the same. The same stale, generic "hard blues", the same boring, classic-rock covers, and , for the most part, the same lack of musical talent.

I heard a good deal about the band 5th Business when I was sent to review their show at the Hatch, Wednesday night. A lot of good things. And with that in mind, I grew anxious to hear a NEW sound from a UMass band - something bizarre, original, funky, hell, anything other than "hard-driving blues rock"!

When 5th Business took the stage almost an hour late, I saw that they did not offer this NEW sound. They do, however, play this form of hard blues rock better than any group I've heard on this campus.

Their set began with a number of covers that past audiences had requested, but they played them with a good deal of bite. And they were tight! Once the originals began, I grew more impressed.

Not with the songwriting, perhaps, as much as how well these boys sang and played their instruments. The songs were standard R&B, dancey numbers that were certainly no worse than any others of that sort by other bands. But when newest member, Chris Bonney took the leads on his six-string, the potential of this band was revealed - he is an awesome lead player obviously influenced by Eric Clapton . . . in all the right ways.

Bassist Tom Mahken added life to his ordinarily underrated instrument with some fresh slapping that fitted perfectly with the group's sound. Richard Gordon played far more creatively than most drummers keeping your standard 1-4-5 at UMass, and they all sing fairly well.

This band needs to emote more, to move around more. Their sound, however, is as tight as can be - clearly, these boys spend lots of time in rehearsal. And they're on the rise.

Kitty Dukakis discusses drinking

BOSTON (AP) — Declaring "I am an alcoholic," Kitty Dukakis said yesterday that she is ready to work the Alcoholics Anonymous program along with her family and hopes others will follow her example in seeking help.

The wife of the governor and failed Democratic presidential candidate, Michael Dukakis, also said she had a problem long before encountering the stresses of her husband's public life.

The 52-year-old Mrs. Dukakis spoke at a crowded press conference just two days after completing a month-long rehabilitation program at Edgehill Newport in Rhode Island. She said her drinking became a serious problem in the three months following her husband's political defeat.

"Any crisis could have led to the drinking," she said. "The campaign was a very positive experience. The only problem is that we lost. ...I don't blame the campaign for my being an alcoholic." She called the period after the November election "terribly painful and lonely."

Her husband said, "I will do whatever is most helpful to her."

He said his decision not to seek re-election as governor was independent of his wife's drinking problem, and that he intended to complete his term through January 1991.

Accompanying Mrs. Dukakis were her husband, who sat behind her on the stage, and her father, Harry Ellis Dickson, associate conductor laureate of the Boston Pops, who sat in the audience along with friends.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Money could come from several sources. Large-scale social events impose on your time and energy. Be firm. You cannot afford to miss a business deadline. Your reputation is on the line.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Property channeled energy will produce fantastic results. A major decision affecting a joint trust can no longer be postponed. Greater efficiency is the key to saving more money. Avoid duplicating someone's effort!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Control your emotions before you find yourself in a situation you will not be able to handle. Resist peer pressure. Your high standards are an asset, not a handicap. Choose your allies with care.

dividual in the gym because he really understands people as well as gymnastics."

Weil is another senior that was redshirted last year. He was the Minutemen's 1987 MVP in a year that he finished fifth in the all-around competition at the EIGL Championships. That is the highest finish of a UMass gymnast in the all-around in the tenure that Johnson has coached the Minutemen, 11 years.

"He is one of the most talented performers UMass has ever had," Johnson said. "With some additional confidence he could be an even better gymnast."

Langan and McCall really define the word dedication. Where as the other four seniors have been in the starting lineup the last few years, Langan and McCall have not seen much action.

But they are at practice every day. Langan has been the announcer at all of UMass' home meets this season. Johnson praised Langan for all the work that he has done for the team outside of just competing.

"John has been a real positive influence in the gym," Johnson said.

McCall did get his one moment in the spotlight when sophomore Dave Dinucci and Myers were injured before a meet with Springfield College last year.

"I'll never forget the Friday before the 1988 Springfield dual meet when we finally put a floor exercise together for him which enabled Greg to make the team on floor exercise, still rings, long-horse vaulting and horizontal bar which enabled us to beat Springfield by .35."

UMass has Springfield again tomorrow. But this time, the meet should not be quite so close.

produce.

As it turned out, things would take a dramatic turn downhill in the second half of the year. A pair of losses at the Bath Ironworks Classic were just the beginning. Atlantic 10 conference play finally began, pitting the Minutewomen against much tougher competition.

Matters weren't helped when junior guard Michele Pytko went down with a season-ending knee injury late in the Bath tournament. Not a particularly deep team when completely healthy, UMass could ill afford any long-term absences from any key players.

As it was, the team was without freshman Peg Ryan, who suffered a stress fracture in her leg and was redshirted. Later in the season it would be senior co-captain Christel Zullo who would be lost for the season with an ankle injury, prematurely ending her fine collegiate career.

"Losing Tara and Jeanine, and then losing people like Michele, Christel and Peg, there's five people who could have helped us this year," Hewelt said.

The Minutewomen had to make do with what they had. But injuries or not, they found themselves mismatched against the league powers such as Rutgers, St. Joseph's and Temple. But through it all they kept battling, still keeping a positive frame of mind and never willing to concede a thing.

After picking up a big win in the first round of the A-10 tourney against St. Bonaventure, the season finally came to a conclusion Wednesday night with a 78-48 loss to St. Joseph's.

Despite the record, there was plenty of good to come out of this year. Senior co-captain Beth Wilbor topped the 1,000-point mark for her career, finishing fourth on the all-time UMass scoring list with 1,014 points and fifth in rebounding with 539. Her 207 rebounds (7.1 per game) were a team high.

Junior center Helen Freeman ended the season as the team's leading scorer with 370 points (12.8 per game) and chipped in 169 rebounds (5.8).

Zullo was one of the team's leading scorers at 12.3 before her injury. Replacing her at the point was sophomore Trish Riley, who took the tough challenge and performed it well, picking up over 100 assists. Her three-pointer at the buzzer to beat Harvard at the Cage will be remembered as one of the memorable moments of the season.

Senior Dianne Burke, little-used before this year, also helped to fill the void left behind by Zullo. Though not a scorer, Burke made up for it with hustle and aggressiveness.

Junior Sue Serafini provided her scoring touch from the bench, and sophomore Colleen Hopkins and freshmen Jenny Moran and Lisa Hair all showed some promise for the future.

But the strong points of this team could not be measured by numbers. Through the good times and bad, the Minutewomen kept a positive attitude, and Hewelt's commitment to the program had lended the stability that has been absent for the better part of four years.

"I'm going to be here next year," Hewelt assured. "We've got some improving to do, but we're out recruiting and looking to bring in new people."

The bad side of the season, the 11-18 record will be left behind when 1989-90 rolls around. But the season was important in building the foundation of what could be a strong UMass women's basketball team in the not-too-distant future.

newcomer of a different sort. The supersoph stepped off the football field and onto the track for the first time in college. Although he suffered an injury-filled season, Bledsoe still found time to impress his coach.

"Having him with his long jump was a big plus," O'Brien said. "He's also the fastest sprinter in the 60 that we have." Due to his leg injury Bledsoe concentrated only on the long jump this indoor season, but O'Brien said that he will use him in the 60-yard dash in the spring.

Jeff White and another talented rookie, Joe Lochiatto had solid seasons in the hurdles according to O'Brien. "They're basically interchangeable, they're that even," said O'Brien. "They're on the doorstep of scoring in the New England conference."

A pair of juniors who saved their best for the New Englands were Art Smith and Gerry Squires. Smith beat his personal best in the 3000 by 15 seconds with a time of 8:15.97, good enough for fith place. Squires smashed his best time in the 5000-meters by finishing at 14:31.9, a whopping 31 seconds better than his previous best.

And so another indoor season comes to a close. What will O'Brien remember most about it?

"I think the fact that 21 of the 23 kids we took to the New Englands exceeded their personal best. It was a very satisfying season," said O'Brien.

bit higher up in Vermont this weekend."

A fine detail within the big picture lies in UMass freshman Erin Klier's battle to qualify for the Regionals as an individual all-arounder. Klier stands as the 10th ranked all-arounder in the Northeast and will get to meet the the gymnast currently reserving the coveted seventh slot in person this weekend. Klier trails Vermont's Laura Sperry by two tenths of a point entering the meet.

"When you know you're in, you can rest a little bit, and when you know you're out, it's a whole different attitude," said Mitchell of Klier. "She's the one on the hot seat, and she's responded."

The heat has been nudged up a bit as well this week with the knowledge that Michelle Antonelli's services on the balance beam will be lost for the rest of the season. Antonelli strained ligaments in her knee during her beam routine last Saturday against Rutgers. Mitchell has yet to say who will step up into her place in the beam rotation, as Anne Ditunno, Elma Lagendek and Kim Keefe vie for the opportunity.

Dan Chesnicka is travelling to Villanova with coach Bob Newcomb to compete in the qualifying round of the National Diving Championships Friday and Saturday. Chesnicka is the first from UMass to go to the Nationals, so he wants to make a good showing.

"My problem is name recognition," said Chesnicka. "All these other [divers] compete against each other in dual meets. I'm an outsider. I want to show that I can compete with them."

In order to be invited to the qualifying rounds, a diver has to log scores of 460 points in the one-meter competition and 475 points on the three-meter board. Chesnicka got those easily during the regular season. The tough part is finishing in the top three in the qualifying rounds to advance to the main competition.

Chesnicka will be up against some tough divers. His personal favorite is Brown University's Charlie Chester. Also, based on what he saw at the Easterns, Chesnicka thinks that John Sharkey of Pittsburgh could do well along with a trio of divers from Navy.

But he admits that, in diving, "anything can happen. When you get to this level of competition, only a few points separate the first-place finisher from the bottom of the field."

Chesnicka feels that a finish in top three is out of his reach, but he would like to finish in the top 10. He said he wants the name recognition that would come with it.

"I just want to get my name thrown into the hat," he said.

That way, when he returns next year, he can concentrate on doing more than just introducing himself.

Gymnastics teams both in action

Minutewomen head north to face Vermont

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

It's not like pro baseball, where you have 160 games stretched over seven months to make a name for yourself. In NCAA caliber women's gymnastics, if you want to see the light of post-season fame and glory, you've got to hustle.

For the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team (7-1), all that stands between the present day and a bid to the Northeast Regional Competition at Penn. St. on April 1st are three more meets, beginning with this Saturday's trek to the University of Vermont (1 p.m.).

The Minutewomen head to the Green Mountain State tomorrow as the 10th ranked team in the region, according to the National Association of Collegiate Gymnastics Coaches for Women, and are scoring an average of 178.16 points per meet. UMass will need to crack the top seven some time soon in order to qualify, a feat from which it currently stands 1.64 points shy.

The Lady Catamounts, meanwhile, have posted a 2-5 record this winter, and are scrapping for a berth in the ECAC North Atlantic meet (unlike the Atlantic 10, the ECAC is picky about who gets to attend). There'll be plenty of nervous butterflys to go around.

"We're under pressure," described UMass coach Alfie Mitchell, "but it's the type of pressure where no one expected us to be anywhere close, so the only pressure that's on us is what we put there ourselves."

"Since they're (Vermont) in the type of position where they need good scores, this is a very good opportunity for us to get a good score also; the scoring may be a little

One last time at home for the men

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

For some it has been four years. For others its been five. But when the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastic team competes at the Boyden Gymnastics Center against Springfield College at 1 p.m. tomorrow, it will be the final time for six seniors to perform in front of the home crowd.

So for Joe Fitzgerald, Tim Myers, Roberto Weil, Jay Ronayne, John Langan, and Greg McCall this is it, one final time to be in the spotlight.

"The team and I are really going to miss their performances as well as their high quality work ethic," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "They've really contributed to the program and I really appreciate that."

Fitzgerald only competes in one event for the Minutemen, the pommel horse. But he is the best that UMass has to offer. Johnson can rely on Fitzgerald to consistently hit 8.5's or 8.9's in perhaps the toughest event of the meet. But that's not all he can count on from the senior gymnast from Reading for.

"He's been an outstanding person to have involved in our team not only because of his athletic contribution but his enthusiasm for helping the team work on fund raising projects, equipment improvements and the overall team well being," Johnson said.

Myers has been the Minutemen's top all-around performer for the past two years. Last season he was the team Most Valuable Player despite missing the last three meets of the year with a knee injury.

Myers was the first gymnast ever in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League to do a double-layout-somersault with a full twist on the horizontal bar.

"Tim is a lot easier to coach than he thinks," Johnson said. "Tim's been a lot of fun to work with because of his dynamic and powerful movements."

Ronayne has been injury plagued this year after being redshirted last season but when he has been in there, Ronayne has been UMass' top vaulter and horizontal bar man. He is currently ranked third in the East in vaulting. The top four vaulters from the east region will be invited to the NCAA Championships in Nebraska.

"Out of all the gymnasts that I've coached, Jay is the one able to get the big picture," Johnson said. "He lets all the small things just pass and concentrates on the important issues. He just comes to the gym, works out and has fun. I really appreciate how much Jay has helped out every in-

Injuries plague women's hoop season

F.O.Y. to Jim McCoy?

Although the voting for the Atlantic 10 basketball Player of the Year and Freshman of the year took place last weekend, the results will be announced at noon today in Woodbridge, N.J.

UMass freshman Jim McCoy is the odds-on favorite to take F.O.Y. Honors. The 6'3" rookie captured the A-10 Freshman of the Week award 4 times this past season.

The season wrap-up . . .

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

On the outside, one can look at the 11-18 record of this year's University of Massachusetts women's basketball team and make a fair assessment that it was a disappointing season.

In the short run, where the amount of wins and losses over a given calendar year is the dictating factor, it was a less than desirable season. But this year's team wasn't focused on any immediate goals. This was a team with a vision for the future, with any instant results being an added bonus.

"We've had a great year," said first-year head coach Kathy Hewelt. "We're coming together and getting a feeling of family here. And we duplicated last year's record with far, far less talent."

Question marks abounded as the season began. Having lost Tara Lewis to graduation and Jeanine Michealsen, who transferred to James Madison, UMass entered November with a relatively inexperienced squad as well as a completely new coaching staff. Hewelt came to Amherst from Indiana Tech as the fourth women's coach in as many seasons.

Contrary to any preseason projections, the Minutewomen jumped out to one of the best starts in their history, reeling off a string of five straight wins before the intersession break. A few eyebrows were raised, and people wondered just what kind of year this team was actually going to

And then there was one.

The University of Massachusetts men's swimming team has been gradually whittled down as it went from post-season tournament to post-season tournament. Fewer and fewer swimmers made the requirements necessary to advance. A few were left behind for the New England Championships. Some more didn't make the trip to the Easterns. And now, only one will be going to the pre-qualifying round of the NCAA Nationals. And he's not even a swimmer.

Minutemen's season full of positives

Men's track wrap-up . . .

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

The season is over for the University of Massachusetts men's indoor track team and coach Ken O'Brien can't wait for the outdoor season to begin in April. That's how successful this past season was for the Minutemen.

"I'm very satisfied with the indoor season. I think we made some great progress," said O'Brien. "And I'm even more optimistic for the outdoor season. They showed outstanding future promise."

The leader of the team was undoubtedly Reinardo Flores. The senior from Cambridge ran in the 800 and the 3000 meters and was the go-to-guy all season long. "He was the man we went to in crunch time. We continually put him in all the toughest meets," said O'Brien. What was impressive about Flores was his ability to improve each time out. "He continually exceeded his previous marks from meet to meet."

"I don't think there is another player for us who is as dependable at such a high level."

In addition to Flores the Minutemen were given outstanding performances from two other seniors, Evon Walters and Fitz Hagan. "Both of them gave us some impressive performances," said O'Brien. Hagan recorded his personal best in the 800 and 3000 with times of 1:56 and 8:27 respectively this past season.

After this trio of veterans comes a stable of underclass talent that O'Brien is looking to for the future. The ring leader is freshman Steven Brown. He was the number one runner in the 400, 500, and 600-meters. "He has good versatility in events," said O'Brien.

Brown narrowly missed the school record in the 600 but did grab the record in the 500 with a time of 1:04.7. "He showed some great promise," said O'Brien.

Another freshman to be reckoned with was Derek Moore. His specialty was the 1,000 meters. The highlight of his season came in the New England Championships when he placed fifth in the 1,000 meters with a time of 2:28.5. "He was the new kid on the block and he has some real promise," said O'Brien. Jerome Bledsoe was a

Candidates' money sources questioned

By PEDRO PEREIRA

A candidate for student president and one for trustee could be disqualified if the Governmental Affairs Committee rules they violated the Student Government Association constitution by using money other than campaign funds for campaign photographs.

The photographs of presidential candidate Tracy Davis and trustee candidate Eric Nakajima, running on the same ticket, were reproduced on leaflets that have been distributed throughout campus. According to Michael Greiner, a campaign organizer, money for the original copies of the photographs did not come from the $125 the SGA granted each candidate for campaign materials.

Committee member Matthew Happy, who works for Josh Gordon's presidential campaign, proposed disqualification because he says Davis and Nakajima violated the constitution.

Chapter 10 of the constitution states, "There shall be no private financing for the SGA Presidential and Trustee elections. UNDER NO CIRCUMSTANCES shall any money be expended by a candidacy other than money given to it by the SGA. NO EXCEPTIONS."

Student senator W. Greg Rothman, committee co-chairman, said the committee has ruled that candidates do not have to pay with campaign funds for the original copies of photos used in campaign materials.

But Rothman added that to the best of his recollection Dwayne Warren and Mark Freidman, who ran for student president two years ago, were charged for the cost of campaign photos.

The matter was debated Saturday evening during a meeting of the Governmental Affairs Committee, but no decision was reached when the meeting recessed at about 11 p.m. Rothman said the committee will reconvene tonight to address the disqualification proposal.

The election for student president and trustee is scheduled for tomorrow, which Pledges to run issue oriented campaign

By PEDRO PEREIRA

A sexual assault and a gay brother and sister have compelled Cynthia Evans to run an "issues campaign" for Student Government Association president, she said Saturday evening.

The candidate made the revelation during an SGA Governmental Affairs Committee meeting as an attempt to silence rumors that she is running to split the vote for liberal candidate Tracy Davis and help moderate candidate Josh Gordon win.

She managed to momentarily silence those who attended the otherwise-loud meeting, but failed to kill the rumors because some left the meeting still saying she is trying to help Gordon. The committee oversees elections and rules on charges of campaign violations. The election is scheduled for tomorrow.

"I am a victim of sexual assault," said the 30-year-old Evans, a transfer student from Cape Cod Community College. "This is not mockery that I'm doing.

"You people are accusing me of not believing in the issues that I'm running," she said. Evans, who says she has two gay siblings, promised she will combat homophobia, racism, and sexism if elected.

W. Greg Rothman, committee co-chairman, apologized to Evans on behalf of Candidates fall under close scrutiny

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Allegations of political corruption surrounding this year's race for president and student trustee of the Student Government Association have forced students to take a harder look at the people who may soon represent the undergraduate body.

Early in the race, several presidential and trustee candidates ignored a rule prohibiting the use of private monies to fund campaigns, which is enforced by the Governmental Affairs committee.

Disregard for this rule forced former presidential candidate Tom Ralph out of the race and slightly reduced the $125 campaign accounts of presidential candidate Josh Gordon, and trustee candidates Sandy Edwards and Rob Skelton.

These early warning signs of misuse have escalated to rumors of campaign "plants," in which a candidate allegedly will be strategically placed into the race to help steal votes from opponents. In this case, the plant will either withdraw from the race and endorse the frontrunner, or simply run an issues campaign similar to an opponent's and cause a split in the votes.

The first "plant" rumor surrounded presidential candidate Cynthia Evans, a 30-year-old, non-traditional student promising to combat racism, homophobia and sexism. Tracy Davis/Eric Nakajima campaign workers allege Evans was placed on the ballot by opponent Josh Gordon to help steal votes from presidential frontrunner Davis, who is also running a liberal campaign.

The confusion surrounding Evans' last-minute campaign began after eyewitness Stacey Kinnamon saw presidential candidate Gordon introduce Evans as an "integral part of his campaign staff" at a United Students Agenda general meeting last month.

But this situation changed when Leslie Abbott, another eyewitness, said she was approached on March 2 by a man asking her to sign nomination paper for Evans' last-minute bid for the presidency.

Michael Greiner, campaign manager for Davis and trustee candidate Nakajima, said Evans' campaign posters clearly indicate she is a plant. Evans' posters sport the Davis/Nakajima rabbit logo and mimic their slogan "Budget cuts are hell," by reading "Politics are hell."

Gordon, however, denied Evans was a part of his campaign and at a debate Thursday night, one of his campaign workers, Bob McDevitt, said Davis/Nakajima campaign organizers placed Morgan Hugo on the ballot as a presidential candidate to steal votes from Gordon.

Following the debate, Gordon, Mark Semonian, his cam-

Attempt to increase higher education funding voted down

By MARIA SACCHETTI

An attempt by Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, to counter state budget cuts failed Friday when the House of Representatives defeated two amendments designed to increase funding to public higher education.

"I'm very disappointed," Rosenberg said. "We came extremely close."

The amendments were proposed last week to offset the state budget approved three weeks ago by the House Ways and Means committee which slashed $31 million from Gov. Michael Dukakis' original budget proposal of $669.4 million.

The initial amendment, which was defeated by five votes, would have provided $15.7 million to increase faculty and a cost of living increase to graduate students who are also teaching assistants.

means the committee cannot adjourn tonight's meeting until its members reach a decision.

Several candidates attended Saturday's meeting and complained when they learned from Greiner the leaflet photos had not been paid for with campaign funds.

Greiner declined to divulge where the money came from and where the leaflets were reproduced, but told the committee the halftones for the photos cost $30. Halftones are pictures taken of photo prints for reproduction.

The leaflet photos appear to be the same that ran in the front page of the Massachusetts Free Press's latest issue. The Free Press, a newspaper that "represents Democratic Party ideals," had Greiner as publisher last semester.

"The Free Press did not pay for this," Greiner said.

Graduate students use wheelbarrows to bring pennies to the Bursar's Office Friday in protest of the emergency cirriculum fund.

Graduate students fight curriculum fee

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

About 50 University of Massachusetts graduate students marched in protest Friday from the Student Union steps to the Bursar's office to pay $100 of emergency curriculum fees — in pennies.

They students said they were angered because the $50 emergency fee charged to undergraduate students this fall to keep 250 graduate teaching assistants form being fired was also charged to them, said Michael Parkhurst spokesman for the Graduate Employee Organization, which sponsored the event.

Chanting slogans such as "We won't pay fees to be employees" and carrying signs that read "Join the GEO — United We Stand, Divided We Fall" and "Pennies From Paupers — No Way," the students marched to Whitmore Administration Building pushing two penny-laden wheelbarrows.

Once inside Whitmore, students marched through the corridors to Chancellor Joseph Duffey's office. The students said they wanted to personally give him the pennies.

But Duffey's office was locked and no one answered their repeated calls for his presence.

"He's never anywhere to be seen when anybody wants to see him," said Pierre Laliberte, an executive officer of the Graduate Student Senate.

The students then took the pennies to the Bursar's office. Mechthilde Nagel and Seth Rothberg, the two graduate students whose fees were to be paid with the pennies, then began to dump the money on the counter to be counted.

Bursar Robert Mishol defended the bursar's office, saying "As long as you understand the bursar's office can't do anything about your situation, I sympathize with you. We have no qualms with what you're doing."

Graduate students already pay about $1,000 in fees and the additional $50 is an unnecessary burden, said graduate sociology student Kakcoli Banerjee.

According to flyers the students passed out at the Student Union, graduate students stipends are "among the lowest in the Northeast yet [their] fee bills are among the highest."

■ amendments for higher education fail

ministrative revisions, including reducing administration and staff numbers through attrition, conserving energy and promoting mandatory recycling on college campuses were also included in the amendment.

The second amendment, which called for a $4 million allotment for library books and materials for state schools was also defeated.

Rosenberg said the amendments were defeated after an hour-long debate Friday night because the legislators refused to go against their constituents' wishes for "no new taxes."

"The membership does not want to raise taxes," he said. "People really wanted to support it but if it means raising taxes, they're not ready to accept that."

In light of this defeat, Rosenberg said he will introduce a so-called "survival amendment," which, if passed, will provide $16.5 million to several issues that have not been included in other legislation.

If passed, funding will be allotted to encompass several issues including the changing needs of public higher education, public grammar and high schools, human services, including child care and welfare provisions, homelessness, and other supportive programs, he said.

"We will try to win support for that larger package of items," Rosenberg said. "The legislators have a great interest in and want to support higher education but, for the moment, they cannot go against their constituents' wish for no new taxes."

Rosenberg said advocates for the amendment "will not give up" until some kind of provisions are made for higher education and the other issues expressed in the amendment package.

The legislators have one week left to debate and lobby for the passage of this final amendment until the budget must be put before the body for a vote, he said.

20-year LS&R veteran to retire

After 20 years of service in the Department of Leisure Studies and Resources, Dr. Jeanne Sherrow is retiring.

Friends, alumni, faculty, and students gathered at the Campus Center Saturday night to honor and bid farewell to Sherrow.

Kamilla Kissell, an LS&R major, said, "Dr. Sherrow's standard for her students was always excellence. She demanded that, and that's what we gave her."

"Dr. Sherrow made unique contributions to the department," said Barbara Schaffer Baker, a 1977 LS&R major. "She taught me to take life seriously."

There was an opportunity in the program for anyone to stand up and tell stories or just say good-bye. Three students in the Leisure Studies and Resources department sang a rap song and Sherrow, 60, was presented with a plaque.

LS&R professor Rod Warnick said, "You have helped us to recognize that there is hope. . . . We love you and thank you."

Sherrow is scheduled to retire officially from the University in August.

"I appreciate the love that you expressed here tonight and I love you all the more for it," she said.

A native of Illinois, Sherrow arrived at UMass in 1969. In 1975, she was the recipient of the Distinguished Teachers Award.

Aid to campaign disputed

Senator says placing of posters a conflict of interest

By PEDRO PEREIRA
Collegian Staff

Undergraduate Student Senate Speaker Robert Fadel admitted Saturday night he has posted campaign materials for two Student Government Association election candidates, which prompted conflict of interest charges from a senator.

Fadel, who has the power to approve campaign materials, has signed campaign posters, including a leaflet for the Tracy Davis/Eric Nakajima campaign that, according to Sen. Matthew Happy, might have used photos illegally paid for [Related story on page 1].

Fadel, who has put up posters for presidential candidate Davis and trustee candidate Nakajima, said during a Governmental Affairs Committee meeting Saturday he is not a member of their campaign staff. Davis and Nakajima are running on the ticket of the United Student Agenda, a liberal organization.

All candidates need to have their campaign materials signed by Fadel or the co-election coordinators before they can distribute the materials. Happy called Fadel's distribution of the posters a conflict of interest because of the speaker's signing power.

Happy proposed that the committee strip Fadel of his signing power, but when the proposal came to a vote it was defeated. No one voted in favor of the motion and Happy abstained.

Nevertheless, the speaker received his share of rebuke.

"I would like to reprimand Speaker Fadel," said W. Greg Rothman, committee co-chairman.

But Holly Brod and Karen Flanagan, election coordinators, defended Fadel, saying he would not have signed a campaign leaflet for Davis and Nakajima if he thought the leaflet were illegal campaign material.

"He approved something that he knew was legal," said Brod. "It's not a question of conflict of interest. I would've signed it without thinking about it, and so would Karen [Flanagan]."

Brod and Flanagan are the only committee members not working on any campaigns for tomorrow's scheduled election. The committee oversees elections and rules on charges of campaign violations.

Fadel disagreed with the charge that he acted wrongly and said he has a reputation for being "very fair." He said he has signed campaign materials for other candidates, to which trustee candidate Al Arpad attested.

The fact that Fadel's signature didn't appear on the reproductions of the leaflets also raised suspicions. But Fadel and Michael Greiner, campaign organizer for Davis and Nakajima, pointed to three dots that they said was the signature. The Gestetner machine they used for reproductions did a poor job, Greiner said.

paign manager, and McDevitt spoke with Hugo in the Blue Wall Cafeteria and, after their conversation, McDevitt led Hugo to the Collegian to publicly withdraw from the race.

During an interview that night, Hugo expressed confusion and a reluctance to remove his name from the ballot.

Hugo denied he was a plant and said Semonian had revealed to him that several "accidents" had occurred to people involved in the campaign, including the throwing of a block of ice through a campaign worker's car windshield and the slashing of another worker's car tires.

"These people play rough. I don't want one of these accidents to happen to me," Hugo said. "Honestly, I want to stay in [the race] and have fun."

During the interview, Hugo refused to state definitively that he would withdraw and returned to his room, escorted by a security worker. Later that night, Semonian visited Hugo's room to clear matters. Hugo said he then spoke with his parents and decided to withdraw.

But because the candidate's name is already on the ballot, he cannot withdraw from the race.

Forum condemns societal violence

An Amherst College organization called for a society free of violence, especially against women, at a discussion held recently at that school.

"We must try to change the priorities in our society so we can live cooperatively rather than competitively," said Francis Crowe, director of the Northampton American Friends Service Committee. Crowe and others spoke at the forum, which was sponsored by Womenspeak.

Womenspeak celebrates the accomplishments of women, said Jen Radin, co-coordinator of the organization funded by the AC Student Finance Committee.

Michele Rosensheim, an Amherst senior and a community educator for Necessities/Necessidades, said the shelter for which she works helps battered women gain control of their lives.

"Women are victims of domestic violence and of our legal system," she said, adding that in 1987 the shelter's hotline received 1,560 calls from battered women, and 108 battered women lived temporarily in the shelter.

Rosensheim said more education and awareness will help in the struggle against violence.

Crowe said people in our society must change its priorities so humanistic endeavors are stressed more than military endeavors.

"We have to take action to see what we believe," she said. "We must be a constant presence in the organization of the community."

University sells out to Anthrax

I am deeply concerned about the Antrax research on the University of Massachusetts campus. UMass has been receiving some $1 million in funding from the US Army for the past eight years.

Anthrax, a disease that affects domestic animals and humans, was first developed as a biological weapon in the 1940's. The disease, made as an air-bursting bomb, infects humans and animals through inhalation, causing the greatest amount of destruction possible.

Slowly but surely, the military is insinuating itself in the University system. Funding of biological research by the government contributes to the increasing incorporation of universities into the military-industrial complex. The university provides respectability to cover the support of the military for more destructive projects. Through this research the military is setting up a reserve group of scientists who are dependent on Defense Department grants for making a living.

The university doesn't fully understand the implications of the biological research they are conducting. Just as Lord Geoffery Amherst sold smallpox infested blankets to the Native Americans 200 years ago, so with new developments in DNA research can biological weapons be used to isolate and infect certain ethnic groups such as Puerto Ricans or Nicaraguans. Perhaps a certain food source could be contaminated so that the disease could wipe out an entire population.

The research at UMass is being conducted in direct violation of the Biological Weapons Convention of 1972, which bans the development, production, stockpiling, and use of biological agents for military purposes. If our government can violate treaties might it not also be planning genocide? I, for one, don't want to see the invasion of our nations campuses by the military.

Singing the LP blues

Last week, I was lying in bed, in a semidelirious state (induced by a combination of too much Robitussin, Sudafed, aspirin, and too many cough drops) when I heard the sound of drums coming from a guy's room across the hall. With both of our doors closed, I couldn't hear the rest of the music — only the drums. But still, the sound was clean and crisp, and I knew it was coming from his compact disc player.

Bob Bobala

It was at that very moment that I realized how much contempt I really have for compact discs. My mind flashed back to a couple of weeks ago when I had asked my buddy across the hall how many CDs he owned.

"About two hundred fifty — but most of them are at home," he said. "I used to work in a record store."

"Uh huh." I was tempted to ask him how many albums he had, but I was afraid of what the response might be. The last thing I wanted to hear was something like, "Albums?! What do you mean albums? LPs are obsolete. Of course I don't have any." So, I didn't bother.

I guess I'm just not ready for all this laser disc technology stuff. That's right, call me old fashioned, or just call me plain dumb, I like the ol' vinyl. One of the saddest articles I've seen lately was in the Boston Globe last month. It's headline read: "Face it, LP: You're history," and there was a big color cartoon above it that depicted two jazzy looking CDs taunting a wilted record album.

How would you feel if you were the LP? For 35 years you ruled the recording industry. Then you got some competiton from the cassette. But that was okay — albums and cassettes can live peacefully, hand in hand. However, now the CD, a shiny, tiny flying saucer from the outer limits of the galaxy, enters the market and, all of a sudden, you're dirt. It's not fair.

Back home, every music or department store I go into is either void of albums altogether, or there is only a small selection. The situation in Amherst is better. Records haven't been pulled off the shelves completely. But I still think the demise of the LP has had its effect here. A couple months ago, I was able to pick up a whole slew of used albums (good titles, good quality) for 25 to 50 cents each. It's as if some local retailers are afraid that people will throw their turntables in the trash and they'll be stuck with a stock of LPs that nobody wants.

Doesn't this CD generation remember what it's like to buy an album? You carry it home — and I mean carry it. It's not a dinky little CD that you can fit in a purse. Then you unwrap it, and, hopefully, the album cover opens up into two halves and there's all kinds pictures, graphics, song lyrics, etc. You place it proudly in your record collection which is organized alphabetically by band and you care for it with your record cleaner from time to time. It's a sentimental experience.

Somehow, I just don't think it's the same with a CD. Besides, some music just was not recorded to be played on a compact disc. Who wants to listen to Muddy Waters or Howlin' Wolf on a clean and clear CD? The Blues has to be played on a scratchy old record, or a beat-up tape. It loses its soul on compact disc.

Plus, CDs cost so much more. Did you know that CDs and LPs cost about the same to manufacture? The recording industry is just raking in the extra bucks on the compact disc's inflated price.

But why carry on about it. Within two to five years, the CD will have dealt the album a knockout blow. I've placed my only hope in a half-baked article that was published last year in the British journal New Scientist. It said that the aluminum coating on CDs could oxidize after a period of three to five years. If this happens their sound quality will be greatly diminished and all you CD yuppies will be wishing you had stuck with the album like me.

Public Safety leaves Black students open to harm

Public Safety: The Big Lie.

It happened again, another vicious racial attack on the campus of the University of Massachusetts. February 15th the Collegian printed an article about a brawl near Totman in which a Black man was left beaten in the street. The article suggested the incident was racially motivated, but didn't elaborate. It never appeared in the paper again.

Why do racist, violent attacks continue to accrue on this campus? Why isn't Public Safety investigating these incidents? What will it take to make this campus safe for Black students?

No one really knows what happened that week in February. No one has reassured us that any action has been taken. And Public Safety still has not taken the steps necessary to protect Black students.

As a freshman in the fall of 1986, I saw the face of racial violence for the first time. Fresh out of a Catholic high school, I was waiting to experience the thrills that college life had to offer. Instead, I received a rude awakening the night of October 27th when I walked out of John Adams and was confronted by a mob of angry sports fans. As Mets fan, I was riding high. I expected Red Sox fans might by disapointed, but didn't expect them to take it out on me. Identified only by the color of my skin, White Red Sox fans decided they could still beat me.

I felt like Indiana Jones being pursued by a tribe of spear wielding Indians. I felt the fear of my forefathers in the South in the sixties. I told to myself this couldn't be happening, "This is Massachuestts and its 1986. This type of activity doesn't happen anymore."

K. Andrew Mitchell

But it did.

In 1986 "the Southwest incident" was well covered in the papers. I thought the attention would bring about change. But in 1988 another "incident" occurred in Sylvan. And less than a month ago, I picked up the paper to find that in 1989 racism is still prevalent.

Why haven't I heard anything on this campus about these "incidents" recently? Why does campus racism receive more attention from national media than it gets here? In a February 1989 article from Harpers Magazine, Shelby Steele highlighted the UMass campus as a hot spot of racial injustice. National Public Radio is now producing a news program on race relations at UMass which will be broadcast nationally. Why aren't the shortfalls of our administration be exposed by local papers?

The UMass Police Department, which has supposedly been trained to deal with "sensitive crimes" continues to harass Black males on this campus. The Amherst police department has repeatedly detained Black males unlawfully. And the Northampton Court House plays dumb when a Black man's rights are at question.

Black students on this campus should not have to occupy buildings to get the administration's cooperation in matters of public safety. Public safety should not be so quick to accuse and so slow to protect us. Whitmore and Art Hilson should stop trying to cover up "incidents." Must there be another "incident" in 1990 before we are safe on this campus?

K. Andrew Mitchell is a UMass student

Merchant explores human nature

It never fails any time The Merchant of Venice is performed. There is always someone who insists that Shakespeare was not only prejudiced, but also a horrible playwright.

Shakespeare lived in the classic Elizabethean era of the sixteenth century. There were hundreds of other playwrights at the time. Is it odd that the only plays we read are the ones written by Shakespeare? Not really. Shakespeare is unique. He always has a protagonist and an antagonist in his plays. However, there is not one specific character that you can point our and say, "He is all evil, and he is all good." He capures the essence of the human spirit. That's why he's still read and performed today. He is able to teach us something about ourselves.

In the Merchant of Venice, Shylock is presented as the antagonist. However, at the conclusion, the audience must decide for itself whether or not Shylock is a tyrant of simply a victim of society and the circumstances that were presented to him. I have seen other productions of the play, and I know the decision about Shylock is a difficult one. By the same token, Bassanio and Antonio are not as pure as the driven snow. Shakespeare doesn't have a clear line drawn between good and evil, because in human nature, there is no clear line.

Shylock also has to have a motivation for being as greedy as he is to make him believable to the audience. Long before Shakespeare was born, the stereotype about Jews being greedy already existed. He didn't invent this stereotype, he just used it as a rational and believable motivation for the character. Throughout the Shakespearean plays, all sorts of stereotypes are used. For example, Shakespeare uses the stereotype of intense rival female jealousy and vanity in "The Taming of the Shrew."

I'm sorry that some are offended by The Merchant of Venice. If it offends you so much, write your own play and break down Jewish stereotypes. See if it sticks around for four centuries.

UMass far from Shantytown

I am writing in support of those students who are suffering in Cutback City. I think their effort at non-vioent political action is heartwarming and may even bring moire attention to the sad plight affecting public higher education in this state, and perhaps even this country. Unfortunately, though, I am also writing because I have a critisism of one aspect of their campaign. Since The Collegian contiues to refer to the area as "Shantytown" I can anly assume that the agitators welcome a comparison between the conditions at the University of Massachusetts and those in South Africa.

Symbols carr meaning. Ofthen they mark the path towards fundamental change. When we use the word "holocaust" people think "Hitler Germany." When we use the expression "burning crosses," we think of "Ku Klux Klan." Given the ongoing suffering in South Africa I believe it is counter-productive to call the shacks outside the student union a "shantytown." The people I know who live in "shantytowns certainly do not do so as a free choice in the name of political action. People who live in shantytowns are Black; they are not allowed to leave those areas, except to work in shite people's houses or mines. As for ecudation, they are systematically denied access to it. They are disenfranchised: economically, politically, and socially. Please desist from minimizing their suffering by comparing our problems of crowded classrooms, higher fees, and cancelled classes to theirs.

But, support the motive behind the creation of Cutback City; write your Congressperson. Don't be disenfranchised through apathy.

Lips to chew on, tidbits from Bone-cow nation

By Jason Talerman
Collegian Staff

The eyeball is fascinating. I'm not just talking about all that window of the mind crap, though there is definitely something mysterious about it. Based on outward appearence, two parts of the human anatomy definitely do not jibe with the rest of the package, the eyeball and the genitalia. I've long been fascinated by both. Caligula was fascinated mainly by the latter. He filled giant marble pools with wine, stripped down his slaves and sent them swimming. His "little fishes", he called them. He should have franchised because the jewelery sales alone would have been fantastic. You can't walk ten feet in campus center without seeing our wonderful friends of the deep on tee shirts, earrings, ties etc. People don't even realize that they are succumbing to ancient sexual paranoia.

No, the eyeball is it for me. The very substance of the things disgust me but underneath all of that veiny white gluton lies a certain intelligence that stops only with the brain itself. There is an artistic sensibility to the eyeball that fish simply do not posess. The Flaming Lip's Wayne Coyne seems to have inherent knowledge of this fact. The eye has turned up again and again Lip's album covers. But it is more than its mere presence that interests me. Wayne presents the eye in that rare combination of humor and evil drama that I just can't get enough of. On the cover of their new Restless album Telepathic Surgery Wayne photographed his own hand hanging over the sink, holding a fake eyeball covered with bright, oxygenated, clotty blood. The water is running into the graying porcealin sink and the whole scene set inside the frame of the ultrawide lens. All the elements of good black humor are present.

The album itself is a fine piece of work. Unfortunately I have been too engrossed in the hell that has been my life to formulate any discerning opinions. I listen to the thing all of the time and love every bit of it but lately I resemble a George Romero extra more than anything else. I spend about 17 hours a day in the dark bathed by weak light, powerful chemicals, and the hum of heavy electronics. There is a title song of sorts, named "Chrome plated suicide" that amazes me. I can't remember one line of it but it swims around in my head like a good jolt from the car battery.

Maybe I should have held off on this review until I had a proper amount of time to do it justice but I somehow feel in-tune with the Flaming Lips. Such confidence in a review can be problematic. I mean, it's the same thing to know someone very well as it is to read them like a book. Yet, one is a compliment while the other is a curse. The sites zero in. When they read you through, it's like a bullet in the back. Let's just say that I enjoy an offbeat intimacy with the Lips. My zest for eyeballs is no different. It's like I said like I said last week. The optic nerve is connected directly into the seat of knowledge. We can't possibly explain it, but vision remains the same.

Valley Women Artists heal with art at Hampshire Gallery

By ANDREA HARTMAN
Collegian Correspondent

An exhibit currently showing at the Hampshire College Art Gallery presents a unique slant on the visual arts as a method of healing. The annual group exhibition of the Valley Women Artists offers different views of the main theme, "Art and Soul." This local group is a chapter of the Women's Caucus for Art, a national organization based in Philadelphia, PA. This organization serves the purpose of promoting the arts and women's place in the specific field.

Gallery

Each work has been created with the chosen theme in mind, and explores the possibilities of influencing either the artist or the viewer in a beneficial way. The artist may feel soothed or be able to release tensions through the act of creating. Likewise, the viewer could experience a sense of tranquility by becoming absorbed in ceratin images or applied colors. These are temporary kinds of healing such as meditation, that bring piece of mind. This exhibit gives an overall impression of a wonderful sense of creativity and vitality.

The pieces in the show are a combination of a wide variety of media including: paintings, sculptures, masks, collages, photographs and computer graphics. An incredible range of ideas and symbols have been placed together, and yet they become unified under the common theme. Many of the works focus on images of women and their roles in society on a general level. Other pieces are intensely personal to the artist and draw ideas from childhood memories or more recent ones.

One group of pieces, ceiling hung sculptures by Rebecca Graves, represent the artist's remembrances of a life in the South. Wires and reeds give shape to a whirling tornado and black crows hovering about a small animal.

A local site, Northampton, provides the inspiration for a ceramic piece by Marianna Rilleau, representing the Iron Horse Cafe. "The Little House that Could" is an amusing structure which contains musicians with their instruments.

Explanations of the artist's thoughts and methods accompany most of the pieces. Since many of the images are abstract or symbolic, these comments enlighten the viewer a great deal. Certain pieces immediately grab the viewer's attention and reveal a high quality of craftsmanship.

Other artworks appear almost unfinished or reveal a lack of skill, perhaps in the artist's choice of medium. Many of the works contain complex and at times disturbing images which most likely serve as a catharsis for the artist. There are a lesser number of calm peaceful images directed at healing the viewer.

A panel discussion entitled "Perspectives on Art as Healing" is scheduled for Wednesday, March 15, 7 to 9. The show remains open through March 24 and is located on the lower level of the Library Center. The Hampshire Gallery is open weekdays, 10:30 - 4:30, Sundays 2 - 5, and closed Saturdays. The discussion promises to raise some highly interesting questions, in the meantime the works themselves are worth checking out.

Too much fluff softens up Doctorow's Billy Bathgate

By TARA HAMMER
Collegian Correspondent

Billy Bathgate
E.L. Doctorow
Random House

Your most exciting summer vacation couldn't compare to the one Billy experiences in E.L. Doctorow's newest novel Billy Bathgate. It is 1935 and the infamous gang leader, Dutch Schultz, decides to make fifteen year old Billy a member. They take him out of the East Bronx, and place him in the countryside of Onondaga.

Billy takes the reader through this journey by reminiscing about these times. He got started in the gang by "good luck." Before this he spent his spare time with his friends hanging around the outside of Schultz's beer distributing building in the Bronx hoping to catch a glimpse of him. His dream comes true when Schultz notices Billy juggling and makes him his prodigy. Now, Billy can witness all the killings and whores that are his privilege in the gang.

Book Review

Unfortunately, because Billy is telling the story, the reader only sees and hears what Billy does (which isn't too much). Even though he's a member, he's new, and isn't privy to many gang secrets. The reader doesn't find out as much as he'd like to. Instead, he gets lengthy descriptions of everything from basements to what people are wearing. If all this unnecessary fluff was taken out, the three hundred page novel would turn into a novelette. It would have been more interesting to find out more about Billy's mother, Mary Behan, an eccentric, if not crazy, woman who has nailed her departed husband's suit to the floor like a rug.

Descriptions are not missing from this book, but a point is. True, it is an interesting story of Billy's journey through the underworld and how he makes his fortune, but so what? The reader doesn't care about Billy, or anyone else. Doctorow, however, tries to make us sympathize with him.

Billy's story is basically one of his stealing money from the gang that they in turn stole from people in New York City. He uses the money to go to an Ivy League school and support his illegitimate child. Could you really cheer on someone like this?

Billy Bathgate is not a bad book. Most of it's enjoyable, but none of the characters are people you'd like to meet even in a bright and crowded restaurant. These are characters that should be kept at a distance in real life, and unfortunately, Doctorow obliges by keeping them at a distance from us in the book too.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Another person's emotional hangups could spoil some of your plans today. Enjoy the fruits of your past labors but keep an eye on your current objective. Retain your humility, and romance will find you.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You could play a leading role in an unfolding family drama. Your communication skills will be tested but you meet the challenge. A savvy suggestion will help save the day. Be innovative.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) You will have to insist that everyone involved face up to a financial dilemma. Try an intimate candlelit dinner to win the heart of member of the opposite sex. Travel is best postponed.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Try not to let your moodiness spill over into your weekend social plans. One phone call or letter could change everything; putting you on cloud nine! Leave any money worries behind.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Travel possibilities are not promising. Plan less expensive entertainment at home. When you put your charisma and charm on the line, romance quickly follows. Know your own heart. Avoid casual flirtations.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) You can be very persuasive, and that helps ease a financial crunch. Make a shopping list and stick to it when you buy groceries. Shed your conservative image and romance will blossom.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) A good day to catch up on home repairs. You get a real sense of accomplishment from finishing a complex project. Dress the part when attending a dinner or party this evening.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) You could end up spinning your wheels unless you have a specific plan to follow this weekend. Wishful thinking will not do it. Relax and be sociable. Satisfy an urge to call someone special.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Be perfectly clear about your weekend plans. Family responsibilities must come first. Give a child a choice. Your exquisite taste may put a purchase beyond your means. You are prepared to wait.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) You will have an exhausting, but satisfying, weekend. Tasteful entertainment delights you. Think seriously about a financial proposal. Focus on short-term goals. The future is bright with opportunity. Get ready to move quickly.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) You will have to work like a beaver to get chores out of the way. Afternoon is the best time for socializing. Shopping could turn up bargains in antiques, clothing and appliances.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) There are fewer pressures on a relationship now. Withdraw from a project you are no longer comfortable with. A young friend who is headstrong needs your help today. Give it without lectures.

■ Evans to run "issues campaign"

the committee and the entire student government.

But the person from whom Evans wanted an apology, John Dunlap, declined to do so. Dunlap, Rothman's co-chairman and a Davis campaign worker, raised the issue of Evans possibly running a mock campaign.

"I believe that you all know I'm right, and that's all I have to say," said Dunlap.

The belief that Evans is running a mock campaign resulted from Gordon's introducing her at a United Student Agenda meeting as one of his campaign organizers, Dunlap said. The USA is a liberal student group.

Dunlap's comments earned criticism from Gordon and Bob McDevitt, one of Gordon's campaign strategists.

"John, I thought you were above this," McDevitt said. Gordon and McDevitt, who denied Evans is running to help Gordon's campaign, accused Dunlap of saying she is because Dunlap wants headlines.

Dunlap conceded he wanted press coverage because although nothing in the SGA constitution prohibits mock campaigns, exposing Evans to the public would bring justice to the situation.

Gordon, flushed, paced around the room, and shouted that Evans has the right to run. He called the meeting a "witch hunt."

McDevitt, pointing to Dunlap, said, "They want Tracy Davis and Eric Nakajima to win, and they'll do anything, legal or illegal, to win."

But McDevitt and Gordon were also accused of wrongdoing. Undergraduate Student Senate Speaker Robert Fadel said they tried to intimidate Morgan Hugo out of his race for president, which Hugo, McDevitt and Gordon denied.

That's a silver lining, however, on what was otherwise a dark cloud of an athletic event. The Lady Catamounts, who are scrapping for a spot in their own ECAC tournament, made it perfectly clear that Saturday's meet was their last chance to post a score worthy of recognition.

The judges then rose to the occasion, bestowing one fat score after another on the good — but not great — Vermont performance.

Five Vermont all around competitors cracked the 36 point barrier. Brooke Taft, who had previously never seen sight of that landmark, leapfrogged the 36's entirely to post a 37.3. Laura Sperry — battling Klier, by the way, for the seventh individual invitation to the regional meet — notched a 36.95, followed by temmate Noel Brockman (36.40). Grady's all around score stood as the fourth best.

"We were more upset about how we performed," said Mitchell. "It got to the point where we got past being mad . . . it was comical. Everyone likes to have high scores, you just have to try and keep it as consistent as possible."

As a result, he decided to be conservative and withdrew two of his big dives which could have made a substantial difference in his standings.

"On the low [one-meter] board, I was missing some spark," Chesnicka explained. "My dives were just a little off though I didn't blow any. On the high board, the judges were a little nervous on my closeness to the board when I dove, so that probably cost me some points. I also screwed up on my two-and-a-half reverse. If I had hit that I probably could have moved up about five places.

Chesnicka plans to work much harder in the off-season this year than he has in the past, taking less time off. As a show of commitment, he has already set his goals for next year, all of which he feels are realistic.

"I want to go undefeated in the regular season," Chesnicka said. "I also want to be the New England champion [and] I really want to make the NCAA meet.'

If hard work and dedication really pay off than look for Chesnicka to reach his goals.

Collegian issues NCAA hoop contest challenge

It's back. Just what you've all been waiting for since Oct. 15, it's the official Collegian NCAA hoop contest. We've gotten such a good response over the first two years that we decided to torture ourselves all over again, just so that you, the college hoops junkie, can have some fun. Anyone is eligible.

The rules are basic. On page 12 is this year's tournament draw. All you need to do is fill out the entire bracket, with just the winners of each game (scores are not needed, unless you're really masochistic).

Once you've filled it out, simply bring it on down to our offices at 113 Campus Center and drop it off in the box at the Classified window. If you want you could mail it, but there's no guarantee we'd get it by next March.

Because the first games will be played Thursday at noon, all entries must be received by 11 a.m. that day. NO LATE ENTRIES WILL BE ACCEPTED! Also, all entries must be on the official entry blank or a similar reproduced bracket (no hasty chicken scratch drawings on notebook paper, please).

As usual, points will be awarded for each correct guess, with later games being more valuable. The top five point scorers will receive a prize to be determined later this week.

Editor's note: Because of deadline, it was undetermined who would be playing North Carolina in the first round of the West.

Men's gymnastics cruises past Springfield

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Simply put, it was the second best effort of the year for the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team.

The 267.85 points was just a tad below the school record of 268.05 that the Minutemen scored last weekend, but it was plenty to knock off Springfield College who could only muster a 253.9 at the Boyden Gymnastics Center on Saturday.

The win over the Chiefs ended the regular season for UMass at 6-1 in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League and set up a showdown with the United States Naval Academy next weekend at the EIGL Championships for the league title. The Minutemen are currently in second place in the EIGL, trailing only Navy.

Saturday's meet was the last home meet for six seniors at UMass. Tim Myers, Joe Fitzgerald, Roberto Weil, Jay Ronayne, John Langan, and Greg McCall were all honored in pre-meet ceremonies by UMass coach Roy Johnson.

"I'm gonna miss competing here," Fitzgerald said. "Its been a lot of fun, a lot of good memories."

Weil had perhaps his best meet of the season, taking first place on the high bar with a 9.2. For Weil though, it was not the end but a new beginning.

"I think it was the best meet of the whole season for me because I think I'm gaining back my confidence," Weil said.

Myers, as usual led the Minutemen in the all-around competition. His 53.95 edged teammates Calvin Booker (53.55) and John Eggers (53.5) for first place.

Myers' best event of the day was the pommel horse where his 9.1 took first over Eggers (8.9) and Booker (8.8.).

Ronayne, who is currently ranked third in the east in the vault added a 9.35 to his resume for a bid at the NCAA Championships in Nebraska. The top four vaulters from the east will be invited to the NCAA's.

It was the second week in a row that UMass has beaten Springfield. Last weekend, the Minutemen gave the Chiefs a little preview of what was to come as they topped Springfield and the rest of New England at the New England Championships in Springfield.

A 9.25 by Eggers, a 9.1 by sophomore Dave Dinucci, and a 9.05 by Myers in the floor exercise gave UMass the early lead, 44.95-43.5.

The Minutemen were much better than Springfield on the pommel horse, outscoring the Chiefs 43.95-38.55, despite Fitzgerald's first fall of the year.

The still rings were one event where Springfield could stay right with UMass. Ramiro Mora anchored the rings for the Chiefs and received a 9.5 from the judges for his routine. The teams deadlocked on the rings, each team combining for a 44.5.

However, that was the only event where Springfield could stay with the Minutemen. UMass proved it was superior on the vault with Ronayne, Dinucci, Eggers, and Booker all scoring nine or better as UMass extended its lead by almost two more points.

Weil also led the Minutemen on the parallel bars where he hit a 8.95, finishing second to Springfield's Jim Farinella.

UMass coach Roy Johnson felt that his team turned in a good performance but improvements have to be made before the league championship next weekend.

"We have to get floor, pommels, rings, and parallel bars going better," Johnson said.

The EIGL's are all that remain for the Minutemen and right now UMass will be going in with a healthy team unlike last year.

Women gymnasts can't keep up with Vermont

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The bottom line, down under a pile of hard feelings and questions, is that the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team was outperformed this weekend at the University of Vermont.

Now, whether or not the Lady Catamounts (3-5), legitimately earned an astronomical 183.10 — compared to UMass's — 177.70, is not so obvious.

"They deserved to win," said a dissapointed UMass coach Alfie Mitchell of the Vermont squad. "We just did not put together a very good effort. The issue is that the scores that they were getting were out of the ordinary, to say the least."

The loss drops the Minutewomen to 7-2 on the season, and places them in a tough position from which to chase a berth in the post-season regional meet. To qualify as a team, UMass must now post a pair of monsterous scores in the next two weeks of competition at the Atlantic 10 tournament and Temple University.

"It's going to be harder (to qualify)," said Mitchell, "but it's still not out of the question."

Individually, UMass all arounders Erin Klier and Kim Grady improved their chances of making the regional meet. Grady turned in a 36.30, the fourth highest of the afternoon, including a 9.4 in the floor exercise.

Chesnicka competes in NCAA preliminary

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Staff

The last of the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team ended its season Saturday as diver Dan Chesnicka failed to qualify for the NCAA National Championships during the preliminaries at Villanova University.

Out of approximately 21 competitors, Chesnicka finished 18th on the one-meter board and 19th on the three-meter board and in order to advance a diver must finish in the top three.

The winners were pretty much who Chesnicka expected, John Sharkey and Vernon Yennick of Pittsburgh University and Charlie Chester of Brown University. Though he didn't make the nationals, Chesnicka was satisfied that he accomplished what he had set out to do, get some name recognition for himself and dive as well as he could.

"I dove all right," said Chesnicka. "I'm pleased. I was happy I beat [Boston University's diver] Joel Beck, who had beaten me earlier in the regular season. I was also happy that on the high [three-meter] board I only finished four points behind the guy who got fifth in the Easterns."

Chesnicka considered the weekend especially successful in light of the fact that he hurt his ankle while making the trip down to Villanova.

McCoy named Atlantic 10's top freshman

The envelope please . . . and the winner of this year's Atlantic 10 basketball's Freshman of the Year is Jim McCoy.

The 6'3' University of Massachusetts Pittsburgh native was virtually a "lock" for the honor since the midpoint of the season — winning the Freshman of the Week honors four times this year while posting some impressive numbers, his 19 points per game was third best in the conference.

"At the end of the season, I had a feeling I was [going to get the award]," McCoy, who also was named third team All-Conference, said.

"I was really surprised to make the All-Conference team," he said.

The only suspense McCoy said was that "sometimes they go by how many wins your team has." UMass finished the season 10-18.

Fellow freshman Anton Brown, the Minuteman point guard was the only other UMass player to receive a post-season honor. The Columbia S.C. native was named to the A-10 All-Freshman team, averaging 12.9 ppg and almost four assists per game.

McCoy is following in some tough competition, last year's freshman of the Year was this year's Player of the Year — Temple's Mark Macon.

"It's a little bit more pressure," McCoy said.

Next year "hopefully we can win some games and come in the top half of the conference, I wouldn't mind not making a conference team if we could do that."

Hoop du-jour: UMass has a commitment to play in tournament in Denver Co. next year where it will be one of four teams. The three other teams are the University of North Carolina, Colorado State, and Colorado.

Anti-Minuteman rally draws 200 to SU steps

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

More than 200 foes of the Minuteman waged verbal warfare against the staff of the conservative newspaper yesterday on the Student Union steps, asking students to speak out against the conservatives, racist threats, and "unfair" charges against an "anti-Klan" faction on campus.

"The Minuteman thugs have got to stop terrorizing this campus," said Tom Daley, an activist from Cambridge who led the rally. Daley and others wore red armbands as part of a "peaceful" message to combat "thuggery."

Daley said the Minuteman and the Republican Club have "attacked" liberals, Democrats, members of the gay community and other students at the University of Massachusetts, causing people to go into "hiding."

Daley said UMass students should not accept the "racist threats against Black students in Gorman dorm," referring to racial notes which were allegedly passed March 13 in Gorman Residence Hall.

The incident is under investigation by the UMass Department of Public Safety. Arthur Hilson, director of Public Safety, said recently he could not disclose what was said in the notes, but that they were racially offensive.

Conservatives among the ralliers said they wanted to know if Daley was trying to insinuate that they passed the notes, but Daley would not respond.

Seth Warren, an activist in charge of the rally, said he was a "a friend of the Friends of the Spartacus League," who, along with other rally leaders, is not from Amherst.

Warren, of New York City, said he and others came to defend the University group that engaged in a wrestling match with conservatives during a Feb. 9 meeting in the Campus Center. Subsequent lawsuits have been filed by both conservatives and spartacists.

UMass administrators barred both the Republican Club and the Friends of the Spartacus League from having meetings on campus. Daley said students should demand that Chancellor Joseph Duffey rescind the ban against the Spartacists, and asked students to write letters to the Northampton clerk of courts so charges against the spartacists would be dropped.

The name "anti-Klan 3" refers to the anti-Ku Klux Klan stance taken by the three sparticists and the video they showed before the February altercation.

"We saw it was necessary for people to stop the Minuteman brownshirts," Warren said. "They are a danger to everybody."

Reggie Fouche, a UMass freshman who spoke during the "open mike" on the steps, said, "I'm tired of the antics of the conservatives" during Undergraduate Student Senate meetings.

Fouche said afterward he did not agree necessarily with the views of the Spartacus League or their friends, but he felt it was necessary to speak against the conservatives.

"I'm not too sure about [the spartacists'] politics, but I'm ticked off," he said.

Alan Ditmore, a Northampton activist, said he was "outraged with what the conservatives have done to close SCERA, the Commuter Area Government, and force out [former CAG president Jay] Festa. The senate has been paralyzed for a year with their filibusters."

The conservatives, who said they did not think highly of the rally's organizers, launched into a slogan-oriented shouting match, attempting to out-shout the Spartacists "UMass students take a stand. Stop the thugs from the Minuteman," with their own "Freedom works, why don't you?"

"I think it's a joke," said Doug Dratch, a member of the Republican Club. "If you read [The Worker's Vanguard], then you see [the spartacists] write a militant newspaper and are just asking for trouble."

About six UMass police arrived midway through the 40-minute demonstration. One officer said they were told of an alleged "injury" to a student, although this could not be verified.

Airline folds; spring break up in the air

As thousands of students begin to pack their swimwear this week for a vacation somewhere in the sun, some people have had their vacations dashed upon the rocks of big business.

The recent downfall of Eastern Airlines and subsequent filing for bankruptcy by the airline has played havoc with this year's spring breakers who now wish they had waited to hear the rumors of the company's pending demise before booking a flight with them.

"Now I'm stuck in the cold and I'm going to freeze my butt off. On top of that I won't be getting tan," said mechanical engineering major Stacey Isenberg. A University of Massachusetts senior, she lost $300 on her ticket to Fort Lauderdale, Fla. and she said she

Elections mark Fadel's exit

Acting president reigned over a turbulent year in the SGA

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

The long and winding road of Robert Fadel's career as acting president of the Student Government Association is quickly coming to an end.

Fadel, speaking on the eve of today's presidential and student trustee elections, said he believes the next president will be ratified successfully and quickly, unlike Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz.

It has been 364 days since Silkoff and Rabinowitz defeated Aram Hamparian and Guy Glodis in the 1988 presidential campaign. The victory, considered by some the most controversial in University of Massachusetts history, led to a rash of suits, countersuits, filibusters and rallies.

The only thing the victory did not lead to was ratification, which is the reason Fadel can today put "acting president" on his resume.

"There have been problems in the senate," said Fadel, a senior political science major. "The senate never used to have factions like it does today."

"I'm not going to say the conservatives won," he said of the senators responsible for the majority of the filibusters. "I'm going to say the students lost."

Fadel, who became acting president because he was speaker of the senate when attempts to ratify Silkoff and Rabinowitz failed, said the title of acting president is just that, a title.

"As speaker I served as a spokesperson for the stands little chance of recovering her money from the airline.

Eastern Airlines, formerly the nation's seventh-largest carrier, filed under Chapter 11 in US Bankruptcy Court in New York Thursday on the sixth day of a crippling strike by the machinist's union.

Calling Eastern to find out about your flight yields only a recorded message saying most flights have been canceled and that shuttle service — Boston-New York-Washington — is still operating.

Frank Lorenzo, Eastern's owner, said the company will keep flying as many flights as possible until the company can be reorganized in the coming months.

A distraught Lori Miller, a senior human nutrition major at UMass, left the Campus Travel Center office yesterday with no solutions for her trouble-plagued $218 flight to North Carolina.

"I was going to visit some relatives and now I probably have to call them and say I won't be there," she said.

Miller said she would not be able to shoulder the added financial strain of purchasing another ticket "at three times the price," especially with such short notice to her and another airline.

"I guess now I either go to the airport on Friday morning and take my flight or find out it's been canceled," Miller said.

The travel agency has been beset with students wanting satisfaction — another flight, money back, anything but losing everything they worked for all winter.

"Students are wondering what to do. But at this time we cannot do anything about giving refunds because all of Eastern's money is tied up in bankruptcy court," said Sandy Gass, manager of Campus Travel Center.

Gass said she has had moderate success in getting jilted passengers onto the standby lists of other airlines such as US Air TransWorld Airlines and Delta. But, she said, refunds are up to the judge.

Many students lost their spring break money because of Eastern's bankruptcy, the ones who paid for tickets by charge card have hope in getting some money back if they contact their charge card company. Those who paid in cash or by check have a slim chance at seeing their money again, Gass said.

Two senior theater majors, Katie Edwards and Susan Pasquantonio and their friend, senior art history major Carolyn Paddock, were to spend some time on the beaches of Puerto Rico, but the sun went down on their trip also.

Each of the three spent $347 on round trip plane tickets, booked through Campus Center Travel, and were unable to book passage with another airline.

Paddock is now going to spend her break visiting friends or at home, but she said, "I'm taking a week off after spring break. I need a vacation."

Sophomore roommates Sharon Lesser, a fashion marketing major, and Remi Moscaritolo, an early education major, were two of the lucky ones who were able to book the last two seats of another flight to Florida, sacrificing two days of their trip in the process.

"This just ruined our break and stressed us out," Lesser said.

Davis and Nakajima brave late challenge

By PEDRO PEREIRA
Collegian Staff

The Tracy Davis/Eric Nakajima campaign served as a punching bag last night while the Student Government Association Governmental Affairs Committee debated a proposal to disqualify them from today's election for student president and trustee.

The committee voted against disqualification, but representatives from opposing campaigns took turns for three hours in delivering blows to the campaign for alleged violations.

The disqualification proposal resulted from campaign manager Michael Greiner's revealing Saturday night that the campaign had used private funds to pay for a photo halftone that was reproduced in campaign leaflets. Halftones are pictures for reproduction of original photo prints.

Although the committee had decided the original copies of photographs could be paid for with private money, the SGA constitution prohibits the use of private funds for campaign materials. Each campaign received $125 for such materials.

Other violations, such as Davis/Nakajima campaign worker John Dunlap's ripping down posters of presidential candidate Josh Gordon, also came up. Dunlap, who said he ripped down the posters because they were covering Davis/Nakajima posters, added he returned them to Gordon's campaign.

"I should have been like everyone else and thrown them down," Dunlap said, responding to repeated accusations of wrongdoing.

When other accusations were thrown at the Davis/Nakajima campaign, including some that implicated co-President-elect Jason Rabinowitz, pandemonium broke out. Rabinowitz left the meeting cursing his accusers.

Insults, such as Greiner calling committee member Matthew Happy an "idiot" and Undergraduate Student Senate Speaker Robert Fadel accusing committee co-chairman W. Greg Rothman of being "brain dead" substituted debate several times. Happy, who works in the Gordon campaign, had proposed disqualification during Saturday's meeting.

Although the proposal was defeated, the committee passed a resolution ordering the Davis/Nakajima campaign pay for the cost of the two halftones.

Greiner said each halftone, done at the Campus Center Print Shop, cost $6. With tax, he added, the total came to $12.60. He had said at Saturday's meeting the halftones cost $30, which he last night said was a mistake.

Davis/Nakajima supporters said their opponents wanted to disqualify Davis and Nakajima because the duo, running on the United Student Agenda ticket, has a better chance of winning. The USA is a liberal student group.

Rothman, who is supporting Guy Glodis for president, voiced his concern over what he called "negative campaigning."

Copies of a flyer that were stuck yesterday on windshield wipers of cars in the parking lots of Brittany Manor and other apartment complexes said Glodis has worked for Amherst Towing, which tows illegally parked cars on campus.

"I don't how Guy Glodis is supposed to win if very student on this campus thinks he worked for Amherst Towing," Rothman said, causing laughter.

Eric Plisko, an Amherst Towing employee of five years, said Glodis has never worked there.

Special Olympians bring basketball talents to town

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Correspondent

"Let me win. But if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt."

These words, the Special Olympics oath was recited by all Olympians during the opening ceremonies of the Western Massachusetts state qualifying basketball tournament, held Sunday at Smith College.

The Special Olympics allow mentally disadvantaged athletes to compete in 15 sports throughout the year, said Cathy Sherrill, spokeswoman for Hampshire County Special Olympics.

Although there are an estimated 1,200 eligible athletes in the area, only 275 are registered with the organization, Sherrill said.

Special Olympics events have rarely been held in western Massachusetts, but the program has expanded significantly in the past few years, she said.

Paul Conrad, 18, of Ware, attends the Hampshire Educational Collaborative program housed in the Center School in South Hadley. The collaborative coordinated special education programs in schools throughout the county. Conrad's team, the HEC Hawks, is a combination of athletes from two collaborative programs.

When the Special Olympics come around, the collaborative puts together a team and enters the competition, said Kevin Mulvaney, Hawks teacher and coach.

On the court, despite his 5-foot frame, Conrad stopped at nothing. As he made his way from one end of the court to the other, he was constantly leading his team members and communicating with them. After the opposing team scored, Conrad, about to take the ball out, yelled to his team, "We're going to get them!"

Though Conrad competes in floor hockey, soccer, track and field — and runs a mile in 6.25 minutes — he said basketball is his favorite sport.

"We've been winning a lot," he said. "It feels good wearing a gold medal around your neck."

He said he has 32 gold medals hanging up on his bedroom wall, and a bulletin board decorated with ribbons.

The qualifiers from Sunday's meet, three teams from each division (seniors and masters), will travel to Fort Devens in Ayer for the state tournament in April.

"The team gets excited for these events," Mulvaney said. "I'm really happy for them when they win. They understand winning and losing and they know the rewards are greater for winning."

Amherst dry spell ends

Administrators warn of stricter drinking policies

AMHERST (AP) — Amherst College has ended a four-day ban on alcohol with a warning from administrators that students could face some very restrictive rules.

College President Peter Pouncey told students at a Sunday campus meeting that the aim of a strict alcohol policy was to avoid a tragedy.

"People's lives are blighted by drink on this campus," Pouncey said. "That's a thing which shames us all."

The warning ban, initiated by the administration and backed by the student government, began Wednesday and lasted through Saturday, according to Michael Zimmerman, president of the student Board of Governors.

He said official student-sponsored parties were poorly attended during the ban. And although some students called for the college to do more about the alcohol problem on campus, catcalls and a chorus of laughter greeted one speaker who suggested at Sunday's forum that under-age students caught drinking be expelled.

North Village fire draws attention

A mattress fire in a bedroom at C18 North Village apartments was put out with a fire extinguisher, at about 1:45 a.m. Sunday, University of Massachusetts police said yesterday.

The apartment's occupant extinguished the fire, and UMass police and Amherst firefighters removed the mattress from the apartment, police said.

In other police reports:

● Police responded to a report of a break into French Greenhouse, at about 2 a.m. Sunday. They found several windows broken and interior doors open, and an investigation is continuing, police said.

● A fight broke out in the second floor hallway of Van Meter Residence Hall at about 2:45 a.m. Sunday, police said. A man found lying on his back at the bottom of a stairwell was transported to Health Services, police said.

● Officers on patrol heard glass breaking near Marshall Annex, and two men fleeing from the area were chased by officers and caught near the Campus Pond. The men were arrested and are expected to be charged with breaking glass in a building, malicious damage costing more than $250 and disorderly conduct.

● A car accident on Governor's Drive resulted in the arrest of a Fall River man, expected to be charged with operating under the influence of alcohol, police said.

● Charges are being sought against two people, after a fight in Washington Tower, at about 8:45 p.m. Friday, police said. An injured man was brought to Health Services and a 19-year-old man was placed in protective custody, police said.

UMass an animal house for students with pets

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Bernie Bucheit and Mac are good friends. Bernie has given up a lot for Mac. Some people don't understand that — when they see Mac is a Burmese python.

"Mac is my friend, I'm attached to him. Mac may look mean, but he's pretty much a teddy bear," Bucheit said.

College students do not have a stable life, which is why the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals generally does not allow them to adopt pets, according to Lynn Peebles, assistant manager of the Springfield branch of the MSPCA.

"Students don't know what they are getting into," Peebles said. Students think they can handle the responsibility of a pet, but are too busy with classes, homework and their social life "to maintain a consistent feeding schedule," she said. "Vaccines are a financial burden students often forget."

Amy Dugas, a senior anthropology major at the University of Massachusetts, has a cat, Cleo, in her apartment in a South Amherst complex. "They (the MSPCA) shouldn't stereotype that college students are animal abusers," Dugas said. "I have seen adults neglect their pets. Students may make better owners."

Dugas said she has a pet mainly for companionship. "Cleo provides a lot of company and fun." Dugas said, "I feel a sense of personal satisfaction having responsibility for something else other than myself."

Dugas said she considers herself a responsible pet owner. "It's like having a kid or something. I feel guilty if he's alone all day in the house," she said. "He has personal needs and needs time spent with him."

She said because one of her roommates has had a hard time accepting Cleo, living conditions for Cleo are better because she is more conscious of keeping the cat's box odor-free and his food dish clean. "I'm more aware of having a better overall environment for my roommates and for the feline."

Dugas said she has had to make monetary sacrifices for Cleo. "I'm on a limited budget. I only have $10 a week to spend on food, for Cleo and myself." Dugas said she spends between $3 and $5 a week on kitty litter and food for the cat. "I've learned to look for bargains and clip coupons."

The management of most apartment complexes has strict pet policies. Brittany Manor, Brandywine, Townehouse of Amherst and Southwood Apartments all state that having a pet in an apartment is a violation of the lease and the student may be evicted if the animal is not out of the apartment in a specified period of time.

Dugas said she does not know if the management is aware that she has a pet. "If they do know, I don't think they students," he said, adding that there is overlap between his speakership and his presidency. "I never used the title and there was never any reason. In our structure, the president doesn't have any constitutional power."

"The function of the president is as a spokesperson for the people," he said. "After that, it is what they make of [it]."

Fadel said the SGA must return student government to the students. The way to do this, he said, is by "bringing a new mindset into student government."

"We have to challenge the student leaders, make them accountable," he said, "and put them in a position where they need to respond to students' concerns."

Fadel was thrust into the public eye a year ago when, as a senator from Hamlin Residence Hall, he ran for speaker against commuter area senator Mary Rita Kropp. The senate had passed nary a motion when he was handed the additional title.

But the position he once labeled "referee" will not be his after April 1, when the winner of today's election is scheduled to begin a one-year term. For the winner, Fadel has this advice:

"Be true to the word unify," he said, "and do not just use it as rhetoric. Forget who ran with and against you and try to work with everyone."

"UMass is entering an era of tremendous crisis — if you don't rally together and see the same goal, even from different perspectives, then UMass is lost," he said.

Candidates for SGA president

Tom Darling

EXPERIENCE

Tom Darling, a senior, said he has no experience politically and he does not want people to vote for him.

TOP CONCERNS

Darling said, if elected, he will install swing spaces in Chancellor Joseph Duffey's house and will award the Chancellor an E-Lot sticker for his car.

He said he will ban all corduroy hats and promises to change student identifications to make them similar to Massachusetts liquor IDs.

Campus wide "Toast Appreciation Day" and mandatory recess will also be established if Darling takes office.

Tracy Davis

EXPERIENCE

Tracy Davis is a student senator, a member of the BOG, and is active on several SGA committees.

TOP CONCERNS

If elected, Davis promises to fight against further budget cuts in the present and in the future and stressed the importance of ethnic and racial unity on campus.

She said she will combat tuition hikes and organize students to fight for their right for a quality and affordable education.

Davis said she will work to increase campus safety by upgrading lighting in high crime areas, by better promoting the Student Escort Service, and by fighting against violence.

Cynthia Evans

EXPERIENCE

Cynthia Evans is a 30-year-old, student who has not been active in campus politics before.

TOP CONCERNS

Evans said, if elected, she will fight against sexism, racism and homophobia on campus.

She also said she will be committed to safety issues, such as increased lighting and escort services and advocates last year's Civility Day and Hands Across UMass events.

Evans said she will work with the student trustee to organize more rallies against budget cutbacks and also wants to increase student awareness through education and programming.

Guy Glodis

EXPERIENCE

Guy Glodis is a senator active in the Southwest Area Government, and a member of the Board of Governors.

TOP CONCERNS

If elected Glodis said he will maintain student motivation and work to prevent further budget cuts in public higher education.

Glodis said he advocates more lighting in Orchard Hill and wants to extend the Student Escort Service to 24-hour availability.

He also promised to fight against administrative attempts to make UMass a "dry" campus, and maintains that students should be able to buy cigarettes on campus.

Josh Gordon

EXPERIENCE

Gordon, a senator and president of Gorman House Council, was a member of the Budgets Committee.

TOP CONCERNS

Gordon said, if elected, he plans to establish a statewide lobbying group called the Massachusetts Unified Student Lobby to prevent tuition increases and further budget cuts.

Increased lighting in Sylvan and Orchard Hill paths and promotion of the Student Escort Service are also concerns.

He supports the return of tailgating before football games and said students should be able to buy cigarettes on campus.

Morgan Hugo

EXPERIENCE

Morgan Hugo is a Computer and Information Science major with no political experience.

TOP CONCERNS

Hugo said he does not wish to be elected and is running "for the experience." He attempted to withdraw from the race last week but was unable to because his name is already placed on the ballot.

Hugo said he can identify with the ordinary student and maintains that the budget cutbacks, textbook prices at the University, and campus safety are among the major issues.

He urges students to vote for the most qualified candidate.

Candidates for student trustee

Al Arpad

EXPERIENCE

Al Arpad is an English major, an artist, and holds a full-time job along with his student status.

TOP CONCERNS

Arpad, who has spent several nights in "Cutback City" to protest state budget cuts, said, if elected, he will focus on preventing budget cutbacks to public higher education in next year's budget.

He will also use a weekly column to convey issues to students and advocates increased funding to minority student programs and the Everywoman's Center.

He wants to change the drinking age to 18.

Rich Barry

EXPERIENCE

Rich Barry, running on the same ticket as Tom Darling, said he also has no experience in politics.

TOP CONCERNS

Barry said, if elected, he will allot severance pay for all students who are expelled from the University, for whatever reasons.

He also said he will renovate the campus by tearing down the Tower Library and putting a giant sandbox in its place and paving the entire campus to eliminate muddy areas.

Barry said he will also paint the Whitmore Administration Building chartreuse.

Sandy Edwards

EXPERIENCE

Sandy Edwards is a student senator, and served on the Capital Improvements Committee.

TOP CONCERNS

Edwards said she will work to propose motions, and prioritize spending of state funds.

A weekly column will be produced through the trustee's office to keep students informed on current issues and events and Edwards said she advocates increased educational programming on issues of diversity and people of color.

She promised to fight to restore tailgating at football games.

Bob Monaghan

EXPERIENCE

Bob Monaghan, a student senator, is a member of the Residential Committee, and is active in SWAG.

TOP CONCERNS

He promises to fight further budget cuts by continuing letter-writing campaigns and student rallies.

Monaghan said he will publish a column and a newsletter to make students, faculty and staff more aware of the issues.

He denounces the alcohol policy and said he will fight to overturn residential policy prohibiting kegs from dormitories and said students should be allowed to buy cigarettes on campus.

Eric Nakajima

EXPERIENCE

Eric Nakajima is chairperson of the BOG, a former senator and member of Public Policy committee.

TOP CONCERNS

Nakajima said he will work to prioritize spending and gear funds toward ending oversubscribed classes, underpaid TAs, and helping students who are unable to get the classes they need to graduate.

He said he will work to educate the trustees on the racial climate on campus and advocates further programming and events on campus to continue to improve multi-cultural relations.

Rob Skelton

EXPERIENCE

Rob Skelton was a member of the BOG and was once active in the Central Area Government.

TOP CONCERNS

Skelton said he plans to "lobby like hell" against further budget cuts and will fight to abolish the position of UMass President David Knapp, which he said is a "ceremonial" post that costs the University about $100,000 a year.

Using local media and publishing a newsletter will be instrumental to inform students of the issues, Skelton said.

He said he will attempt to restore tailgating.

care because half the people [in the complex] have animals."

Bucheit, a UMass senior, said Mac lived with him in his Baker dormitory room until the administration received an anonymous tip and forced him to remove Mac from his room. University policy states that pets are not allowed in any buildings on campus.

Bucheit said he took Mac's "mobile snake home" to Patrick Sweetman's house in town so Sweetman could "babysit" the snake.

The "mobile snake home" is a large cardboard box lined with a trash bag, which keeps the house waterproof, Bucheit said. A waterbowl, heating pad and a brick are the sole furnishings in Mac's house. The heating pad maintains the 78 to 85 degree temperature required by the Massachusetts Division of Fisheries and Wildlife for a tropical snake's surroundings, he said.

"Snakes do not require a great deal of care," Bucheit said. "Mac doesn't eat too much, a four-pound rabbit each month."

Bucheit has not had to sacrifice financially for his pet, but, he said, "I've given up some friends. People stand outside my door and think I want to stick Mac down their throat. I guess you can't turn on everyone to snakes."

Peter Mirack, the information officer for the Massachusetts Division of Fisheries and Wildlife said, "We don't encourage keeping a Burmese python unless it is for behavorial studies."

"Snakes are subject to several diseases, and the temperature range must be maintained for tropical snakes," he said.

Mirack said, "If you really want a snake, go out and get a garden snake."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Important election issues

The Collegian is not endorsing any candidates for Student Government president or student trustee. Most of the candidates are the same people who have been a part of the Student Government Association and have not proven themselves. However, we feel the following issues should be a priority for those elected.

- The SGA itself is a concern. The past year has been a farce. The constant filibustering and bickering accomplished nothing besides robbing the SGA of their credibility. It is not only the president and trustee, but the senators also have to stop the game-playing and get some work done.
- The budget cuts. The cutbacks in funding to the University of Massachusetts should be fought. The problems with add-drop, the reduced amount of class sections, and the hiring freeze all negatively affect the quality of our education. This should be one of the biggest concern of those elected.
- Safety on campus. The SGA needs to take responsive and sensitive action when it comes to campus crime. This includes assault, racial and sexual harassment, theft, and vandalism. Increasing awareness of these crimes, and increased protection against these offenses are imperative for better public safety.
- Promoting civility. Education about racism, sexism, and homophobia should be one of the top priorities of those who are elected. This includes the continued funding of the Lesbian, Bisexual, and Gay Alliance and Third-World organizations. Efforts to raise awareness about these groups should be made.

Unsigned editorials reflect the majority opinion of the Collegian board of editors.

Support MassPIRG

On today's ballot, there will be two questions about MassPIRG. Question One asks if MassPIRG should be funded by contributions. Question Two asks if MassPIRG should have student support.

MassPIRG is a a student-organized public-interest group that has lobbied for toxic waste reductions, the Bottle Bill, the Lemon Law, and consumer rights. It also offers an unparalled opportunity for students who want to effect change and get experience in public relations, organization, and lobbying.

As of now, the MassPIRG fee is automatically added to our tuition bill, with a box to check for those who don't want to pay for MassPIRG. However, Question One asks if students want instead to check-off a box indicating when they do want to contribute, with no waivable fee on their bill.

In past elections, MassPIRG has always had overwhelming student support. Students have always voted in favor of the $4 waivable fee (the only RSO that has a waivable fee), not a positive checkoff (which would make it a charity). If MassPIRG were to be funded without waivable fees, it wouldn't have sufficient funds to do its work.

MassPIRG is a valuable asset we must preserve. Today vote NO on Question One and YES on Question Two.

Hurting innocent pawns

Last week marked the end of John Tower's character assassination. In a vote split along party lines, the Senate canned his nomination as Secretary of Defense. It wasn't because he's unqualified; the man is competence incarnate. It wasn't because he's a drunk or a womanizer; even the FBI couldn't find anything unusual there. And really, several senators are worse — Kennedy got into a barroom brawl recently, and two years ago an unsuspecting waitress interrupted him during a sexual liaison in a restaurant. Tower wasn't blackballed for his defense industry connections, either; legislators regularly benefit from commercial special interest groups.

Rusty Denton

No, the democrats in the Senate simply decided to beat up on Tower to punish Bush for his rough and dirty politics during the presidential campaign. Personally, I wasn't too thrilled with Bush's campaign tactics, either. In my opinion, every candidate he sucker-punched during the Republican primaries would have made a better president. But the public voted for him, so the public deserves him, along with his nominees and his policies. I'd swallow hard and say the same things if Dukakis had won. That's democracy.

This business of ganging up on someone's reputation in order to thrash someone higher up is distressing. Bork, Rehnquist, Koop, Quayle — it's all the same story. Sometimes the nominee survives, sometimes not.

I wish I could say it was different at the local level, but in many ways the philosophy is identical: hurt someone innocent to make a point. It's like the communists, who add to the misery of the lower classes in third-world countries, and then blame the government so the poor will do the dirty work of revolution.

Here, we have anti-military protesters attack the reputations of perfectly legitimate local researchers . . . in order to harass the Pentagon, which funds them. Pro-abortion activists urge a boycott of local independent Domino's Pizza franchise owners . . . in order to censor the billionaire founder of Domino's, who contributes to pro-life causes. Anti-apartheid protesters want American businesses out of South Africa, leaving Blacks there suddenly jobless and hungry . . . in order to pressure the wealthy Whites in government. Someone innocent always gets used.

I doubt most activists in these parts would countenance beating up kids in order to persuade their parents to change political parties, but that is the moral equivalent of the kind of negative, vindictive and self-glorifying politics that has become the norm among the "compassionate" and "enlightened".

I subscribe to a biblical philosophy that says activism is hypocritical and cynical if there isn't some level of personal involvement creating alternatives. I'm not talking about designing new programs that hire bureaucrats with other people's tax money. That's just letting your envy rob the rich, and letting your pride keep the poor at arm's length. No, I'm talking about going broke to finance what you believe in, and going sleepless to do menial labor (and I don't mean licking stamps or stuffing envelopes) so someone else can have a better life.

I've done it, I'm doing it. It doesn't leave much room for vindictive politics. Be creative. You don't like apartheid? Help South African Blacks set up their own businesses so they can get some wealth. You don't like pro-lifers? Find an effective way to communicate about responsibility and sexuality so that young women won't get pregnant. You hate militarism? Search out additional humanitarian programs the Pentagon will be interested in funding. You loathe slander campaigns? Learn to use the press to show both sides of the story. Those things are constructive; they bring about reconciliation and human dignity instead of division and despair.

Hurting innocent pawns is an ugly game. Nobody who cares a whit about justice will play it.

Teaching high school students about fashion, fads

I wish I was in high school again. Boy, do they have it made! There are proms and dances and high school rivalries. The hardest assignments were finishing two chapters of *Moby Dick, a few Algebra problems, and maybe conjugate some verbs in Spanish. That was the life!

But I really envy those high school students in Kansas City, Detriot, Knoxville, Cerritos (Ca), Billerica (MA) and Cinnicinati! They are the few that get the great opportunity to watch Channel One television in their classes. I never got to do that.

What is Channel One, you may ask? Well, Channel One is a new television station that produces a ten-minute news program for teenagers, providing them with news at "their level", topics ranging from world events to rock concerts.

Chris Whittle, producer of Channel One, calls his new creation an "enlightened partnership between the business community and the educational community."

You see, within this ten-minute news extravaganza, these lucky teens get to watch two minutes of commercials.

Yes, IN SCHOOL you can be taught what the "in" styles are — what clothes to buy, what soda is the most "hip," where to buy the cheapest pizza, and how to get rid of zits in three days.

Meredith O'Brien

And who ever said that you never learn anything valuable in school?

Forget this "cultural illiteracy" garbage saying that our schools are lagging far behind in a global perspective and have no real knowledge of math and sciences. This is America, where we need to know our priorities!

Channel One would provide the missing link that all American schools are lacking — the proper connection to American business and the solution to apathetic students.

This captive audience sits down everyday eagerly waiting to be educated by watching and completely absorbing what Channel One has to offer. They not only learn about what's happening in the world and their country (outside of the very limited scope of their dating scene), but they learn, with Whittle's expert orchestrating, where to wisely spend their money. Or, more precisely, where to spend their parents' money.

Mr. Whittle aspires to have up to 8,000 American high schools participating in his Channel One project. After all, young minds would benefit from Whittle's concern for their education, their knowledge, and of course, their quickly disappearing bank accounts.

I really wish that I was in high school again. I guess I truly missed out. The "Golden Age" of teen news in the classroom evolved somewhat after my time. Sure, I got stuck reading "the classics" like Shakespearean plays, The Scarlet Letter and Gulliver's Travels. And what do they get to do in high school now? — watch Channel One.

They're so lucky. What a great step for secondary high school education — McDonald's and McNews in the same ten minutes! What a bargain!

SPRING BREAK

REBUT TO THE 'YEAH, BUT....'

by Dr. Jim Abel

Stop a moment to think...what would it be like to be one of the hundreds of UMass students who will return from Spring Break with a sexually transmitted disease (STD), or an unwanted pregnancy or both?

Most of us have heard of gonorrhea, syphilis, herpes, crabs, AIDS, and chlamydia, but there are approximately 50 known STD's which most of us have never heard of. Many occur more frequently than the STD's people have heard about. Like gonorrhea, AIDS, or chlamydia, a lot of these diseases can be infecting an individual without causing symptoms.

In reality, people have some "safer sex" knowledge (but, for a lot of reasons, they elect to ignore it). What they may not know is: 1) The majority of STD's occur without symptoms. 2) It's common for a person to have more than one STD at the same time. 3) Spermicides are gentle detergents and antiseptics. They not only undo sperm, they destroy a wide variety of STD's (including the AIDS virus) on contact. 4) Sperm, viruses, and bacteria are more than 1000 times larger than air and water molecules. Latex will not let water or air pass through it. You can bet that latex condoms are effective for preventing STD's and pregnancy. 5) Combining latex condoms with spermicides gives sexually active people their best protection against unplanned pregnancies and STD's.

"YEAH, BUT rubbers fail a lot, and they break too much."

Not true. Condoms work fine. Used correctly their failure rate is less than 5%. But they have to be used correctly, and people fail to do that. Small condoms on large penises tend to break more frequently, but the reverse rarely occurs. The main reasons condoms fail:

1) They are put on improperly.
2) They are used with oil-based lubricants (vaseline, baby oil, cold cream, vegetable oils, Crisco, etc.) which degrade latex (oils and saliva are also poor choices as lubricants because they increase the risks of infection). Only water-based lubricants, like KY jelly, should be used with latex condoms.
3) The person(s) using condoms are intoxicated, so they use them improperly.
4) The condoms are handled too roughly, -or-
5) They are old and have been exposed to excessive amounts of light, heat or cold.

To inhibit the transmission of STD's, the combination of a condom plus a spermicide is the best protection for oral, anal and/or vaginal intercourse. A condom combined with a spermicide is nearly 100% effective in preventing pregnancy.

"YEAH, BUT rubbers don't feel good, and spermicides are gross."

Not true. Spermicides act as lubricants and mimic natural moistness. Condoms are soft and silky. They feel great! If condoms cause a loss of sensation it's probably due to reduced feelings of lubrication. That's resolved by putting a dab of lubricant in the tip of a condom (better yet, add a lubricant that contains a spermicide) to increase sensitivity. Lubricants can go on the outside of condoms, too. Don't forget: you or your partner should hold the condom at the base of the penis when necessary to keep it from slipping off (this may happen when the penis is starting to get soft, during sex when the partner is sitting on top, if the partner is "tight", or when withdrawing the penis). Besides, holding on like that feels good.

Some say they dislike the sight, texture, taste or smell of condoms and spermicides. They may not know that some condoms and spermicides are pleasantly scented

THE SCOOP ON SCOOPING

by Ron Mazur, Health Educator

Spring Break - a time on the slopes, by the sea, or back in the hometown. And, according to the masculine mystique, a time for "making out." But, yes, times are a-changin'. Whether it's men loving women or men loving men, for example, concerns for "safer sex" require a "latex etiquette" which may be awkward to learn but which promises greater risk-free pleasure.

Avoiding date rape by listening to your partner's wishes, desires and concerns may also require a new set of sexual customs and behaviors. If a potential sexual partner says "YES," then the only problems are pleasant ones - or the usual ones of performance anxiety, use of contraception, or of what-goes-where-when, regardless of the gender combination.

If the response is "NO," however, that sets up a number of potentially disasterous scenarios. The one under consideration here is the assertive man with the assertive woman and/or flavored. Condoms come in different colors, too, while others are textured with nubs or ribs. Some condoms have an unpleasant taste, but many have no flavor at all. Spermicides have varying degrees of bitter taste which may or may not seem objectionable. Since there are lots of condoms and spermicides on the market, one can readily find those that are not personally offensive. Their proper use promotes a healthy, satisfying sexual relationship. The enjoyment this brings can work to make their sight, taste, smell or feel an erotic experience.

"YEAH, BUT rubbers are too big (too small) for me, and they look dumb."

This is not always true. Rubbers come in quite a variety of sizes and shapes (so do condoms), and latex will hug or stretch to fit all those variations. With hundreds of different condoms to choose from you can be sure you'll find several kinds that fit just fine.

"YEAH, BUT spermicides make me sore; so I can't use them."

This is not always true. A person could be sensitive to the perfumes in some spermicides. Switching to scent-free ones may eliminate the problem. Also, there is quite an assortment of spermicides (gels, creams, foams, suppositories, tablets, films, sponges, lubricants) which come as different chemicals (nonoxynol-9, menfegol, d.i.p.p.e., octoxynol-9) in a variety of strengths. Selecting another form of spermicide, a different chemical or one with a lower strength may provide you with several choices you can use without irritation. If a person is truly allergic to all spermicides, their male partner can still add a spermicidal jelly or lubricant to the inside of his condom.

"YEAH, BUT rubber, foam, lubricants and all that stuff ruin spontaneity and turn me off."

"All that stuff" won't seem so cumbersome if you are practiced and familiar with their correct use. Think up clever ways to incorporate them into your love life. Make them an exciting part of foreplay instead of an interruption. Share the responsibility of using lubricants and take turns inserting a spermicide or putting on the condom. Talking about the sexy things you plan to do (or are doing) with condoms, spermicides and lubricants can be erotic. Be honest about your feelings: If you are embarrassed, nervous or inexperienced say so! This can be exciting and erotic for a sympathetic partner. It also allows an opportunity to pause and experiment with other kinds of lovemaking. It lets your partner know that he or she can be honest too.

Using condoms and spermicide will reduce sexual health worries and fears of pregnancy. The increased security, decreased anxieties and positive sense of responsibility they can bring can make sexual expression more enjoyable. Condoms and spermicides don't have to make sex boring (sex is only boring if the people who are doing it are boring). The excitement and fun of sex are limited only by imagination and creativity.

"YEAH, BUT Lesbians don't ever catch STD's so I don't have to practice safer sex."

This is not true. Everyone should be practicing safer sex. Lesbians are not immune to STD's, including AIDS. There are some lesbians who have had or will have sexual encounters with men while exploring their sexuality. These women need to practice safer sex with their partners regardless of their gender. A dental dam--which is a latex shield--as well as "good old" saran wrap, placed up against the vagina during oral sex will prevent the partner from coming into contact with vaginal secretions. Vaginal secretions can transmit STD's regardless of the woman's sexual orientation.

"YEAH, BUT how do I know which is the best condom to use?"

First you might want to talk with others who use condoms or know a lot about them. Experiment on your own. Get several kinds of condoms to practice and play with. Discover that condoms can really be fun.

"YEAH, BUT sometimes I get drunk, and we'll forget to use something."

If you're drinking or doing drugs you will be clumsy and your judgement will be impaired. Forego sex rather than use being "zoned out" as an excuse for acting irresponsibly. We can hurt ourselves or someone else when we're intoxicated.

So What's the point? Just this: AIDS, other STD's, and unwanted pregnancies are not someone else's problems. Anyone having sex with another person and not taking certain precautions is at risk. It makes little difference how that sexuality is expressed; be it gay, lesbian or straight. All of us must act to protect ourselves and our sexual partners.

■ THE SCOOP ON SCOOPING

when they are both asserting different desires: his "YES" to her "NO". (Yes, men can and do say "NO" to women, but that is another story.)

The lusty longings of young men can turn the fun of Spring Break into traumatized lives when the guy is insensitive to, or ignores the following:

1. Scoopin' and scorin' may be great for ice cream and computer games, but they have nothing to do with Human sexuality.

2. It's dangerous to use your penis for your brain. In fact, the most powerful sexual organ is between the ears, not the thighs, and the largest sexual organ is the skin, not the genitals.

3. A responsive woman who may not want sexual intercourse on a given occasion may, in fact, want other pleasures of intimacy which may be delightful revelations to an unimaginative male.

4. A "NO" at any point creates an opportunity for gentleness and communication which may provide a lifetime of beautiful memories.

A man who responds attentively to his partner will avoid being charged with date rape and screwing up two lives in the process. He will also learn how to become a sensitive lover.

Where are you headed for Spring Break ...don't be headed for Skin Cancer.

by Rita Hirsch, Health Educator

According to the American Cancer Society over 500,000 new cases of skin cancer are reported every year, making it the most common form of human cancer. Fortunately, skin cancer is one of the most curable forms of cancer when it's discovered early. Better still, most skin cancer can be prevented. Take this quiz to test your knowledge about skin cancer.

Why Talk About Sex:

The following piece epitomizes the struggles of sexual communication and we would like to share this with you.

There is something I don't know that I am supposed to know.
I don't know what it is I don't know,
and yet am supposed to know,
and I feel I look stupid
if I seem both not to know it and not know what it is I don't know.
Therefore I pretend to know everything.

I feel you know what I am supposed to know but you can't tell me what it is because you don't know that I don't know what it is.

You may know what I don't know, but not that I don't know it, and I can't tell you. So you will have to tell me everything.

■ SPRING-TIME BLUES

by Lynn Bechtel, Mental Health Educator

Mid-semester break is almost here. You have a week off to lie in the sun, party, see your family, eat home cooking, sleep late, visit with friends who go to other schools. And mid-semester break marks the beginning of spring, that wonderful season of warm weather, flowers, leaves on the trees. All this is enough to raise anyone's spirits no matter how deeply you've sunk into wintertime doldrums, right? Not necessarily. Mental Health experts have long recognized that spring can be a dangerous season with, for some people, an increased risk of depression.

Spring is a time of new beginning, new growth. If you're an optimist, a generally happy person, it might be your favorite season. You're in sync with what's happening around you. But that's not true for everyone. Many people encounter the hopefulness of spring with increased sadness, pessimism, anxiety or depression.

As college students you have some specific concerns. For you the joys of spring might be undermined by worries about schoolwork, family turmoil, romantic difficulties, or future plans. Mid-semester break, instead of being a time to relax and blow-off steam, might seem endless with nothing to do but worry and brood.

Even those of you whose lives are going smoothly might find that mid-semester break isn't as terrific as you'd hoped. Maybe you've spent a couple of months telling yourself how great it's going to be. You've made wonderful plans. Your fantasies are perfect. But you discover that real life continues even on break, and real life includes bad weather, arguments with friends, exhaustion, not enough time alone, too much time alone, sunburn, hangovers.

The point of all this is not to be a prophet of gloom and doom, but to help you get the most enjoyment you can out of your break and the spring season that follows. Here are some tips:

1. Expect to have a good time over break but don't expect perfection of yourself or the situation. Aim for flexibility in plans and expectations.

2. Don't expect major life transformations to occur over break.

3. Figure out ways to take care of yourself. Have fun, party,but don't ruin your break with exhaustion, bad sunburn, hangovers, and sexually transmitted disease (play smart).

4. If spring is a difficult season for you, think about whether your unhappiness is situational, related to school, pending graduation, the prospect of a summer spent with your family, unresolved feelings of grief, an anniversary reaction to loss: Naming a specific problem, or problems, is the first step towards finding solutions. Be patient. This might take time. It might also take time. It might also take require help from friends, family, or professional counselors.

5. Recognize the signs of serious depression; persistent changes in sleeping and/or eating; unusually low spirits; inability to enjoy anything; withdrawl from people; low self-esteem; expressions or thoughts of helplessness; bodily aches; fatigue; irritability; or thoughts about hurting yourself. If you notice any of these signs of depression it's time to get professional help.

The Mental Health Division of the University Health Services offers individual consultations. In addition, the Mental Health Division offers a one session, two hour workshop, "So You've Got the Blues" on request to student groups. If you have a question, or would like an appointment, call 545-2337, Monday through Friday between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m.

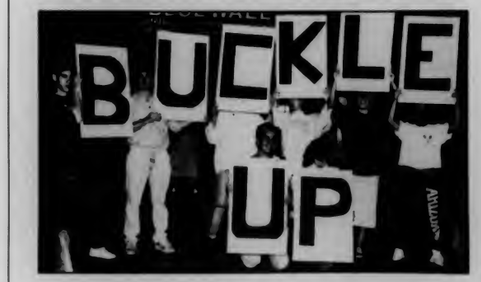
Ten reasons NOT to wear seatbelts



1. Seatbelts will wrinkle my clothes, and besides I'm wearing sunscreen.
2. Having an accident is not on my list of Things To Do over Spring Break.
3. Believing in Newton's Laws of Motion is against my religion.
4. I am doing a paper on Emergency Care in Local Hospitals.
5. I'm not going anywhere ... except to Northampton.
6. I'm 22 and my predicted life span is 78.5 years.
7. I can't sit close to you know who ...
8. ... it's my father's car.
9. ... Don Johnson doesn't wear one ...
10. ... I'm not too bright!

■ SAFE, SOBER SEX I.Q.

by Deirdre Scott, Health Educator

1. Which of the following combinations may create a potentially unsafe situation?

(a) Consuming some amount of alcohol among good friends at home.
(b) A banana peel on the floor.
(c) Consuming lots of alcohol and meeting an attractive stranger.
(d) Consuming no alcohol and meeting a stranger.
(e) A terrible blemish on your face.

2. A person is LEAST likely to remember what he/she did or said the night before if he/she ...

(a) Forgot to write it down.
(b) Had a black out due to excessive alcohol consumption.
(c) Wasn't a good listener.
(d) Had a bad time.

TRUE OR FALSE:

1. Even under the influence of alcohol, a person can always be in control of a sexual encounter: T or F

2. If a person is drunk, he/she shouldn't be held accountable for his/her actions: T or F

3. Use of alcohol helps communication: T or F

Your S.S.S. I.Q. is BRILLIANT if all your answers made the connection between a person's excessive alcohol consumption and their lack of behavioral control. Consider these facts:

ALCOHOL IS A POWERFUL DRUG that effects our judgement and decision making skills. It can cloud our ability to think clearly and recognize dangerous situations. It can also confuse our perceptions of a sexual assault experience.

ALCOHOL USE DOES NOT CAUSE SEXUAL ASSAULTS TO OCCUR, but it is often present in sexual assault situations. Alcohol releases our inhibitions that often act as a safety valve for unacceptable behaviors. It often seems like the use of alcohol gives people an exuse or permission to act out these behaviors..."Well, I was drunk and didn't realize what I was doing..."

COMMUNICATION IS LESS DIRECT after just a few drinks. People begin to act on their assumptions rather than on what is actually being said. As someone continues to drink more, communication breaks down further. Ignoring what's being said and belligerence may result as well as abusive language and touching.

Maintain a high S.S.S. I.Q. this spring break. If you drink alcohol, do so in moderation. Know your limits. And have fun.

How to have that All-important "Safer Sex" Conversation

by Lynn Bechtel
Mental Health Educator

"Use condoms and spermicides. Practice safer sex. Talk. Think. Plan. Whatever happened to spontaneity?" Marion waved a newspaper article in her friend, Jonah's face. "Here. Read this," she said. "See what I mean?"

Jonah read, out loud. "Learn as much as you can about STD's and safer sex. Talk with friends about fears, new information, strategies for incorporating safer sex into your love life. Plan in advance for a 'safer sex' conversation – where and when you'll talk, what you'll say." He handed the article back to Marion. "Makes sense to me," he said.

"Yeah, yeah. But how do I do it? Everyone says talk, talk, talk. O.K. What do I say?"

Marion's not alone. A lot of people are uncomfortable talking about sex. "Sex is a natural process," some people say. "Organic. Don't ruin it with words." Other people are simply embarrassed. "You don't talk about things like that," they say. "My parents certainly never talked about it." And some people aren't sure they should be having sex at all. "I'll talk about it if I have to, damn it, I'm doing it."

Herpes, genital warts, chlamydia, AIDS – the STD risks are too high not to talk about safer sex. Fortunately, talking about sex gets easier and less embarrassing, with practice. And talking about sex doesn't mean only discussing the difficult stuff. Talking about sex also means being playful, talking about your fantasies, and telling each other what feels good.

We can't give you the actual words to use in a "safer sex" conversation but we can give you some guidelines.

1. Think before you talk. You need to know why you think it's important to talk about safer sex. You need to know what your expectations are; i.e. do you want monogamy, several partners, an on-going relationship, a casual encounter, etc. You need to think about your own history and about how to share that history with someone else.

If you have an STD you might feel worried that the other person will reject you. Don't let this fear keep you from telling them that you are infected. Practice telling your potential partner about your situation in a calm, straightforward manner: "I have herpes. I only have occasional outbreaks and I know when they're coming. I was careful with my last girlfriend and she didn't get infected." The other person may react with questions, fear, uncertainty. Be prepared for this and stay calm. Your openness and honesty can help reassure your friend. If you don't have an STD you should think about how you'll respond if your potential partner is infected. Think about what information you'll need and be prepared to take some time making a decision about sexual activity. Whichever side of the situation you're on, remember that caution is smart.

2. Plan when to have your conversation. If you wait until you're in bed with your partner, aroused and ready to go, before saying, "By the way, there's something we should discuss," then chances are you'll have a difficult conversation. Instead, plan to talk about sexual history and STD concerns at a time when you both are comfortable: relaxed, sober, and not sexually aroused.

3. Speak for yourself rather than the other person: for example, begin statements with "I feel like..." or "I would like..." State what you want to talk about and why you think it's important. "I've read a lot about STD's and I've got some concerns I'd like to tell you what I've been thinking and find out more about you. I'll enjoy sex with you more if we talk about this stuff first."

4. Stick to the point even if your partner tries to change the subject. Be a "broken record." Repeat a statement like, "I know this is difficult but I think it's important."

5. Be prepared for the person who responds to a discussion of safer sex with denial or rejection. Don't take it personally. Remember, you're the smart one, doing your best to stay healthy.

Talking with friends is a good way to discover strategies for effective safer sex conversations. If you want general information about STD's call Health Education, 549-2671, x 181. If you have questions about your own health, make an appointment at UHS with a physician or nurse practitioner, (549-2600). If you would like help dealing with the emotional aspects of STD's call Mental Health Services, 545-2337, for an appointment.

■ Answers to Skin Cancer Quiz

1. TRUE Protect your skin, even in the winter. So if you're heading for the slopes for Spring Break, bring along some sunscreen.
A tinted opaque cosmetic foundation can give a little added protection as well. Also, it is important to remember to apply sunscreen an hour before going into the sun.
Note, too, that skiing may take you into higher altitudes, where there is less atmosphere to absorb the rays, so your risk of burning is greater.

2. FALSE At least 1/2 of the sun's ultraviolet rays funnel through the water droplets in a tee shirt or sunblock.
Also, the sun's rays penetrate through three feet of water, so you are not safe even when swimming underwater. For real protection when you are swimming, use a waterproof sunscreen or sunblock and wear a tee shirt.

3. TRUE Other early warning signals of skin cancer are: a change in color of a mole or wart, and the development of any odd skin discoloration. Pearly bumps that crust over or bleed without healing should be looked at by a physician.
Ninety percent of all skin cancers occur on parts of the body that usually aren't covered by clothing. The face, tips of the ears, hands and forearms have been the usual sites, but now the shoulders, backs and chests of men and the lower legs of women have become common.

4. FALSE An umbrella alone is not adequate protection. Ultraviolet rays can bounce off surfaces such as sand, water and concrete.
During the mid-day, the rays are strongest. The hours between 11 and 2 are the most dangerous.

5. FALSE Eighty to ninety percent of ultraviolet rays penetrate clouds. This makes you just as vulnerable on cloudy or hazy days, so use your sunscreen.

6. TRUE Other high risk people are: blonds, fair-skinned and freckled people, and people with repeated exposure to the sun - either for occupational or recreational reasons.

7. TRUE Ultraviolet rays penetrate more on a still person than an active one. A person lying on the beach will burn faster than a person playing tennis.

8. TRUE Birth control pills increase your susceptibility to the sun's rays. Other temporary factors that increase susceptibility are: some antibiotics, antibacterial agents in medicated soaps, barbituates, and some perfumes.

9. FALSE The best protection from the sun is not hanging out in the sun for long periods of time. But if you do, wear a wide brimmed hat and clothing to cover as much of your skin as passible.
Sunscreens with PABA (para-aminobenzoic acid) are a must. The other term you will see on your sunscreen is SPF (sun protective factor). Choose a sunscreen with PABA that has an SPF factor of 15 or higher for maximum protection.

10. FALSE Think again, it's a sign that you've exposed your body to harmful ultraviolet rays, and put yourself at risk for skin cancer, pre-mature aging and wrinkles.

WHAT'S YOUR SCORE ???

80-100.....You'll feel 100% better on Spring Break having safe fun in the sun!

70-80.....Nice try. Now you know!

Conservatives have a voice in Republican Club

By HOLLIE LAWTON
Collegian Correspondent

A few years back, Iggy Pop sang the words, "I'm a conservative ," with tongue firmly planted in cheek. For many, his sarcasm has transcended through changing times. But for those who utter this phrase with pride, conservative philosophy is a way of life, and the not so "new right" at UMass is 6 years old.

The UMass Republican Club, founded in 1983, was formed to counterbalance the liberal atmosphere here on campus. Currently headed by president Ted Maravelias and vice-president Jim Black, the club draws a significant amount of students. There are 50 active members, and a total of 200 registered. According to Doug Dratch, an active member, the Republican Club is " the only outlet for UMass conservatives to voice their opinions."

With the founding of The Minuteman (the conservative student newspaper) in 1986, the Republican Club has been successful in openly expressing their right-wing political views. In the recent past, the paper has drawn much attention due to its offensive overtones directed towards Blacks, women, leftists and gay students. Although the Minuteman offends members of the University community, for the Republican Club, it does serve a purpose. Brian Darling, an active RC member, said, "We go a few steps further to be noticed." In comparison to the Massachusetts Free Press (a progressive student newspaper), the Minuteman is more visible. The Republican Club feels that the outspoken nature of the conservative paper is an effort to be heard, and to gain a larger readership.

"There is a definite need for the Minuteman here at UMass," Doug Dratch said, "We try to be humorous, yet serious at the same time," he added.

Aware of the University's attempt to sever ties with The Minuteman, these conservative students don't appear to feel threatened. The Republican Club sees the administration's actions as an attempt to publicize their opposition to the paper. Some of the members feel that the students take matters addressed by the Minuteman too seriously.

"The so called open-minded community isn't as open-minded as they claim to be," Darling said.

In addition to The Minuteman, the Republican Club is active in Student Senate. Although the members of the club are an extreme minority in the Senate, their efforts are largely recognized. According to Darling, a major role played by the republicans in the Senate is, "a stoplight . . . we try to keep them in line, the republicans are there to control the spending."

As well as their activity in the Senate, student conservatives are concerned with University issues. The Republican Club stands strong as the only political group on campus that publicly opposes the alcohol policy. Not only do they disagree with the policy, but with the policy makers as well. According to some club members, the club does not gain much support from the administration, and has an antagonizing relationship with the Dean of Students.

"Because of our reputation . . . we get blamed for more than we actually do," Darling said.

The recent publication of The Liberator has sparked some controversy. The liberal paper appears to be conceived as a direct response to the viewpoints expressed in The Minuteman. According to W. Greg Rothman, Senior Editor of The Minuteman, it stems deeper than that.

Rothman, who is opposed to the KKK and the Nazi party, believes accusations connecting him and other local conservatives with these organizations have gone beyond what is considered political.

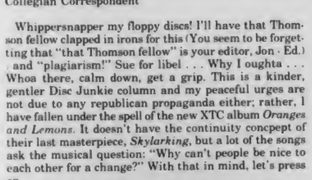
"I don't think these liberals understand the severity of such organizations . . . drawing those analogies is so dangerous," Rothman said.

Rothman suggests that these attacks on him personally, as well as those directed toward the Republican Club, are due to the recent resignations of Jay Festa and Ted Chambers from student government positions, and the suspended nomination of Brian Crawford to the Student Senate, not just because of The Minuteman. "These people are hard core left-wing, corrupt, and have abused the trust students have put into their leadership."

Citric acid drips fast from XTC's psychedelic fruit

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Whippersnapper my floppy discs! I'll have that Thomson fellow clapped in irons for this (You seem to be forgetting that "that Thomson fellow" is your editor, Jon - Ed.) and "plagiarism!" Sue for libel . . . Why I oughta . . . Whoa there, calm down, get a grip. This is a kinder, gentler Disc Junkie column and my peaceful urges are not due to any republican propaganda either; rather, I have fallen under the spell of the new XTC album Oranges and Lemons. It doesn't have the continuity concpept of their last masterpiece, Skylarking, but a lot of the songs ask the musical question: "Why can't people be nice to each other for a change?" With that in mind, let's press on . . .



"Woefully unglamorous" is how Melody Maker described Andy Partridge, the chief creative brain behind Britain's XTC. True, Partridge may not have the glitz and flash of Prince or Madonna, but what he lacks in image he more than makes up for in his ability to create brilliant songs. Of course, talent alone has never been enough to crack the American market, which demands its stars to be involved in hideous scandals, usually involving deviant sexual practices, and XTC has suffered as a relative unknown. They did have their 15 minutes of fame a while back with "Dear God" a song which earned the stations brave enough to play it firebombing threats from fundamentalist organizations. Last summer saw another momentary burst of recognition when their hippy, trippy alter-ego band, The Dukes of Stratosphere had a minor hit with the flower power album Psonic Psunspot."

Oranges and Lemons is the band's ninth official album, and if there is any justice in the world, it will be a major smash. I admit that I may have a predeliction for "placid mouse" music (as Thomson would have it), but there are times when even my techno heart can be won over by elegant, wonderfully crafted pop songs. And, by God, this album has those in spades! Gorgeous melodies with hooks so palpable that they seem to reach out of your sound system and impale your brain. As Nick Lowe put it, this is pure pop for now people."

It's a dream, basically. A vision of naive, psychedelic days when love was in the air and LSD was in the bloodstream. Check out the cover art. It's Peter Max's "Yellow Submarine" technique, with Dave Gregory's guitar mutating into a tuba out of which day-glo oranges and lemons fly.

The cover is only the beginning. Check out the music. At the opening, a reverse spiral of Mellotron noise flings you headlong into XTC's lysergic daydream. The drums have that metalic 60's clank to them, the guitars are fuzzy and newspaper taxis appear on the shore, waiting to take you away. Let yourself go with them; float like a hallucination through tales of love ("The Loving," "Mayor of Simpleton") and give-peace-a-chance ditties ("Here Comes President Kill Again," "Across the Antheap,"). Fans know that XTC have been emulating The Beatles for a while now, and although you might have thought that they had purged their systems with The Dukes of Stratosphere, this record shows that they've still got the bug. If the tablas on "Poor Skeleton Steps Out" don't convince you, then maybe the Magical Mystery Tour brass section of "Merely a Man" will. Even though XTC are trying to be the Fab Four, they still manage to sound fresh and original. However, further discussion will only dilute the experience. Grab a copy of Oranges and Lemons, play it at very high volume, and prepare to experience pure ecstacy.

Tenuta on subhuman suburbans

By AMIE FINKELSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

Judy Tenuta
Campus Center Auditorium
March 10

The Campus Center Auditorium was filled to capacity with hundreds daring to become "Love Slugs" last Friday evening, as popular comedian Judy Tenuta performed her outrageous stand-up routine.

Comedy

As Tenuta leaped on stage, dressed in a screaming silver jumpsuit laced with a pink satin shawl, "given to her by Nancy Reagan," the "Hot Amherst Love Squids" chanted JUDY, JUDY, JUDY!

"You're beggin' for abuse from the goddess of love," Tenuta threatened. She had come to UMass to convert the "suburbanite sluts" to her comedy religion of "Judyism." Audience members came prepared, holding signs saying, "I'm a pilgrim to the goddess" and "Possess me," offering what Tenuta called "sub-human sacrifice."

On stage with her infamous accordian, Tenuta told stories about selling tickets to her mother's nervous breakdown, and her college roommate Blozanne, who listened to Yoko Ono albums all day.

Judy described Blozanne as a two foot, one inch 690 pound mime, who dipped her head in powder and looked like a doughnut.

"She's not fat," Tenuta said, "she's just retaining Boston Harbor. And, she smokes, because she says it keeps her weight down. On college life, Tenuta said, "I could've been in a sorority . . . but I already had a personality of my own."

To offer something political, Tenuta joked that the First Lady, Barbara Bush was old enough that "she could've babysat Tip O'Neil." The jokes were quick, and the audience reacted well throughout the show.

Comedian Eddie Brill opened the show with solid material, the "Boston accent" and a slaying of the stereotypical "Long Island Girls."

Psycho-punk Gang blasts playful pop with Plastic X

By WILLIAM JAMES
Collegian Correspondent

Plastic X/National People's Gang
Sheehan's Cafe
March 10

A breezy Friday evening and the indescribably wonderful Rockin' Dave started the wild thangs off upstairs at Sheehan's with acoustic guitar and Richard Zafft on bass. The crowd was the usual bunch of aspiring bar flies and friends and the tunes were, well, Rockin' Dave and friends (including the unpaired Friar Ted). Mentioned here because as soon as Dave and Co. get it together with a band and get regular gigs you'll be blown to itsy bitsy pieces.

Then came the night, and as the doormen puffed out their Nautilus chests Plastic X hit the stage. What was once the Heretix came on without the keyboards, a new drummer and a brand new guitarist. Together with this lineup for one month, and only one previous performance, these guys were tight, energetic and loud. There wasn't a gigantic crowd but everybody got what they wanted: loud fun.

I'd describe them as heavy metal, but I liked them so . . . the interaction on guitars was excellent, especially when considering that it was based on a month long union.

And then - The National People's Gang. Hailing from Orange County, Ca., together for five years, their manager described them as a cross between the Sugarcubes and Talking Heads with a little Aerosmith thrown in. Whatever.

It's too seldom that one can be blown away by what one guitar, a bass, drums and a voice can do. This was a professional band - all the musicians were more than solid, they had their craft down and were tighter than the UMass budget.

N.P.G's first album, Hard Swing, put out three months ago on the Dr. Dream label received only one harsh critique - an accusation of too much technical mumbo jumbo on the vocals. What's strange, according to the band's manager, is that the singer didn't use anything but his voice. These guys turned rock and roll into art and if you think that's pretentious you either weren't there or you were too drunk to listen.

What was their music like? Indescribable and unforgettable. "Frightening punk and off the wall pop" is the standard description. That's accurate enough. But they're also friendly and weird and wild and - that word again - true. They know exactly what they're doing . . . and there's no bullshit.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Others are prepared to follow your lead today. Inspiration comes from an unexpected source. Seize an opportunity to catch up on your reading. Romance will work out just fine. Avoid petty squabbles.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) You should have few complaints today. Favorable influences abound! Strengthen the ties of love and friendship. Travel is best postponed. You feel more adventurous as your energy level rises. Seek new experiences.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) A wonderful day lies ahead if you do what you can to make partner happier. Loved ones expect you to help with a problem. Do not forget an anniversary or birthday. Call parents.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Have breakfast in bed if you want. Strenuous exercise is unlikely to appeal to you. Try to show more understanding for parent or child. Patience works wonders! Make better use of your intuition.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22) The weather could delay a visitor or date. Enjoy a relaxed, carefree day. Entertain influential people, but keep things simple. Differences that have marred a relationship will disappear. Forget past grievances.

VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept.22) A very good day, especially for those interested in art, music or the cinema. You feel more confident about your future. Spend time with someone who is lonely. Suggest worthwhile activities.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 2) Give serious thought to doing less work on weekdays. Family members deserve more than you are giving right now. Making social plans is somewhat complicated. You could find yourself at loose ends.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov.21) You have a wealth of original ideas. Someone who is usually reliable could let you down. Be forgiving. A very good day for romantic pursuits. Your charisma draws people to you like a magnet.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec.21) Sports may be a high priority today. This is no time to deplete your money reserves. Confess and ask forgiveness if you have not been totally straight with your partner. Promise to do better.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Your spirits should soar today. Turn your attention to improving your health. Leave the evening free so you can rest and read. Postpone any long-distance travel. Loved ones need your guidance.

AQUARIUS (Jan.20-Feb.18) You get along with almost everyone today. Avoid talking about money and you will have a wonderful time. Once you confide your desires, a romantic relationship will explode with excitement and pleasure.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Forego making too many plans today and you will not be disappointed. A quiet day appeals to your home-loving side. Get your checkbook balanced and the bills paid. Romance beckons.

"Definitely someone who I see it as having a lot of time on the field and being a really strong contributor."

Freshman Jodi Hubbernan is also a rookie that should see some time. Hubberman will play somewhere in the midfield.

The Defense: This is the real question mark of the team. Senior co-captain Lynn Hartman is the lone returnee from last year's defensive corps. Bossio is anticipating starting five freshmen in front of her goalie this season. Hartman will have to be the stabilizing force but as Bossio says, she can't expect Hartman to carry the defense all by herself.

"Lynny has taken total control of the defense. But she can't do it all because she has to worry about her player," Bossio said. "Lynny has improved that much more since last year. Her timing on her checks is great, she's reading the play very well, she's stepping up to intercept, she's knocking down passes, she's getting to the ground ball first. We are going to depend on her a lot on defense."

as inexperienced as we are in the defense, they are doing OK. They're not perfect. And they are going to make mistakes. What's important for them is to not get frustrated."

The Goalkeeper: With the loss of Stone and Vacirca, the Gazelles were without an experienced goaltender. Bossio would have had to recruit a goalie but, enter sophomore Elizabeth Keats. Keats transferred from Keene State College because Keene does not have a lacrosse program for women. Bossio is excited about her new goaltender.

"I'm real excited to get this kid because she's tough," Bossio said. "She is going to be a great goalkeeper. She's quick, she's aggressive, she's not afraid of the ball. I think she is already as good as Pam was towards the end of Pam's season last year."

She may be in midseason form already before the start of the season, but Keats is also in the midst of making an adjustment. In high school games, the goalie uses a much smaller stick than in collegiate competition. Once Keats makes that transition, if she hasn't already, UMass could be set at goalie for the next couple of years.

> 'I'm really looking for them to control the ball a lot and to minimize the amount of time that we're in defense. Not that I don't think our defense can't handle it, I just think that their inexperience will catch up with them.'
> -UMass coach Patti Bossio

Tracey Anderson from Newton and Cindy Dolce from nearby Longmeadow are two freshman that will be expected to step in right away. Another New York native, Donna Murphy and Kelly Rickenbach from Philadelphia are another pair of freshman that will log some hefty minutes for Bossio.

"My whole defense is going to be freshmen and Lynn Hartman," Bossio said. "So they're going to have to take in a lot pretty quickly. I've been on them, yelling, screaming. They're just going to have to take a lot in, in a little time. They're doing OK for as young as they are and for Keats and the rest of the Gazelles will get the first taste of the 1989 season this weekend when they travel to Hofstra University. The fun of Spring Break continues as UMass travels to Loyola on the 23rd and to Maryland for a date with the Terrapins on the very next day.

Bossio is looking forward to her second year as head coach of UMass.

"This represents the culmination of my goal of making [UMass] an integral part of the basketball activities of Basketball City, USA," UMass Athletic Director Frank McInerney said.

"To now be a part of bringing a first-rate, Division I Holiday Tournament to round out Springfield's intercollegiate basketball activities is a thrill to all of us at the UMass-Amherst campus," McInerney said.

"Flexibility and range make us real strong," says O'Brien concerning his distance crew, and that his runners are "not necessarily pigeonholed in one event." For example, Heffner, who runs around a 1:55 in the half mile, can also run the much longer steeplechase in 9:06, a very good time. Flores does a 1:53 in the half mile, but is also able to race a sub-25 minute five-mile race.

However UMass needs some help in the field events.

"We still have a gap in the throwing and jumping," said O'Brien. Trying to fill the gap will be sophomore Chris Colclough and freshman Bryan Gluck in the shot put. They were the top performers in the shot put during the indoor season.

UMass has a difficult schedule this spring. "We have dual meets against real tough opponents. We can't expect many outstanding performances." For instance, this spring's first meet pits UMass against Dartmouth, Cornell, and UNH – Dartmouth was indoor Ivy League champions this year.

O'Brien believes an early tough schedule will ready his team for the EIAA Championships (May 6) and the New England Championships (May 12-13). Average performances during the regular meets may be followed by super performances in the championship meets. Hopefully the addition of a good group of sprinters will put the spring in UMass men's spring track team.

She's a freshman and she's had a good season in cross-country and in the indoors."

Amy St. Pierre, a freshman from Beverly, took the indoor season off due to a health problem. LaFreniere said St. Pierre was sick throughout the fall and in January had both her tonsils and her wisdom teeth taken out. LaFreniere says, "She's already up with the varsity group. She has the talent to be close to Precious. She's definitely running in the 3000, 5000, and maybe the 10,000, but her strength is the 5000."

Senior Anna Montouri will run in the 10,000, an event which UMass had no runners in last year. LaFreniere said, "When it comes to a flat track, Anna doesn't have the speed to keep up in the shorter distances. But she's the type of runner who can hold a 6:20 mile for 10 laps."

Junior Shana Smith and freshman Cheryl LeClerc will both run in the 800 and the mile. Smith weakened toward the end of the indoor season especially after intersession, according to LaFreniere, but said she is looking very good in the pre-spring workouts. Speaking of workouts, nobody could keep up with LeClerc last week. Her personal best of 2:19 in the half mile in the New England 4x800 relay is a foreshadow of her outdoor season. "She just looks absolutely wonderful," says LaFreniere. "As a freshman, she didn't come prepared for the cross-country season, but now she's really devoted to it and she also has a lot of natural talent. I think the PR 2:19 is just a glimpse of what's to come."

DeSantis and another javelin thrower, Nancy Laurie, did not have a throwing event equivalent to the javelin indoors, so they are fairly fresh. The success of throwers like Helen Balouras and Tina White from the indoor season should translate into similar results outdoors.

White had a fantastic first two weeks, raising the school record in the 20-pound weight twice. After slumping a bit toward the end of the season, Balouras went on to break White's record in the New Englands. Assistant coach Jim Giroux says, "Helen's shot has been improving since February. If she gets some consistency, the disc will be her best event." He said that White should have improved distances compared to the winter, since she throws a better hammer than the weight.

Simone Marisseau will be trying to continue the rise in the shot put after a big PR from the indoors. She's expected by the coaching staff to top 40 feet in the event, place in the New Englands, and qualify in the ECAC. Marisseau likes the outside season better, because the shot is a plastic (instead of iron) and smaller ball.

Freshman Diane Ozzolek will also try to continue her indoor success. Giroux said, "at the end of the indoors, the weight was doing really well for her. That usually translates into a good hammer."

Laurie, like DeSantis, throws the javelin exclusively and placed anywhere from second to sixth last year. She is expected to go the New Englands but will have to improve her throws by about 10 feet to make it to the ECAC's.

There will be some major differences moving from indoor meets to the great outdoors, LaFreniere said.

"The weather really affects the throwers. It's a matter of keeping warm for the throwers [and] the small outdoor ball should benefit the shot putters," she said.

"It should be faster outside, especially for the sprinters."

And, although the conditions may be different for the outdoor season, the philosophy remains the same.

"We're basically looking to the New Englands and we don't have a lot of meets (5) to qualify. The season begins in March and the New Englands are the first week of May, so we can't fool around. Our goal is to qualify as many people in as many events," she said.

UMass spring sports previews . . .

Freshmen will play a big role for Gazelles

The UMass women's lacrosse team's leading scorer, junior Sue Murphy (above) and the rest of the Gazelles are gearing up for their new season which will begin next Sunday, March 19th at Hofstra University.

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse coach Patti Bossio has no choice this year. She will have to go with youth and inexperience.

The class of '92 will dominate the starting lineup this year for a number of reasons.

Number one, the Gazelles were hurt by graduation. Gone is high scoring forward Ginny Armstrong who was UMass' second leading scorer last year with 33 goals and seven assists.

The defense was also weakened with the loss of goalie Pam Stone who graduated last spring and Amy Vacirca who just did not come back to school this year for reasons unknown.

Number two, the Gazelles were also hurt by an injury to a key defensive player. Dual sporter Michelle Pytko went down with a knee injury during basketball season and is lost for the entire season.

Only four starters will be returning from last year's squad, which went 8-6 before bowing to Dartmouth in the final game of the East Coast Athletic Conference Tournament. This year's roster includes 10 freshmen on a 17 woman squad that will begin its season over Spring Break with three road games.

"Of those 10, their will probably be six starters," Bossio said. "They're good but they are freshman and they're going to make freshman mistakes. If this group stays together, we're going to be pretty good down the line. Everyone of these kids are going to contribute to my program at some point in time."

But those freshman will not be without guidance on the field. There are also a couple of seniors on this team and they are not looking down the line. They're looking at now. So with that, here is a breakdown of this year's team.

The Attack: Bossio is not worried much about the Gazelles' ability to put the ball in the net, even with the loss of Armstrong. UMass returns its top scorer from last year in forward Sue Murphy. Murphy was a force around the net last season, scoring 40 goals and dishing out 24 assists in 15 games to lead the team in just her sophomore year.

One player that should be on the receiving end of many of Murphy's passes and vice versa is senior co-captain Cathy Fuhrman. Fuhrman was the third leading scorer for the Gazelles last season with 19 goals and 12 assists. Murphy to Fuhrman and Fuhrman to Murphy should be a familiar site throughout the season.

The team chemistry should not be disrupted much, with the loss of Armstrong and the arrival of new freshmen in the starting lineup on attack. Sophomore Liz Hoye herself is coming off her freshman year in which she scored 2 goals and one assist. But don't let the low totals fool you. Hoye got a lot of playing time but was not the main option on the attack with Murphy and Armstrong hooking up on many occasions. With the absence of Armstrong, Hoye could score a few more goals this season.

"They are doing really well," Bossio said of the three veterans' play in practice up to this point. "I know they'll put the ball in."

"I'm really looking for them to control the ball a lot and to minimize the amount of time that we're in defense. Not that I don't think our defense can't handle it, I just think that their inexperience will catch up with them."

The offense will also be a little inexperienced. Junior Ann King is ready to see some serious minutes this year after not getting much playing time last year. She scored three goals and two assists last year in a limited role.

Bossio also recruited a couple of freshmen that she believes will turn into real threats somewhere down the road. One in particular is Dolores Angulo, a native of Westbury, N.Y. Angulo was a high school All-American for W.T. Clarke High School. Bossio compares her to a young Cathy Fuhrman.

"Great speed, great speed, and good skill," Bossio said.

UMass track teams head for the outdoors

Minutemen blend quickness and durability

By ROBERT SIMPSON
Collegian Staff

They've always been able to go the distance, but now they've added speed to their endurance, and are ready to duke it out with any opponent.

No, I'm not talking about boxing. Who said any thing about boxing? I'm talking about the University of Massachusetts outdoor men's track team.

Head coach Ken O'Brien, in his 22nd year at UMass, hopes to add quickness to a team centered around durability this spring.

"Traditionally we've had most success in middle distance and distance events," said O'Brien. This year he will try to develop a sprinting corp, and naturally he is starting with freshmen and sophomores.

In the 100m, O'Brien will go with freshmen Jerome Bledsoe and Kevin Walters, and sophomore Michael Grey. Walters and Grey are also strong in the 200m, while Bledsoe uses his speed in the long jump. Bledsoe jumped 22'9' during the indoor season.

In the 110m hurdles freshman Joe Lachiatto and sophomore Jeffrey White will be the top two runners for UMass. Junior Garfield Vaughn, one of the few experienced sprinters, will compete in the 400m along with freshman Steve Brown. Both are capable of running under 50 seconds.

The University of Massachusetts outdoor track teams are off and running for their spring seasons. Junior Joe Livorsi (above) will be one of the key members of the Minuteman attack.

UMass has plenty of veterans in the distance and middle distance events. Senior Reinardo Flores had an outstanding indoor season in the 800m and the mile, and is probably UMass' best overall distancer. After Flores come juniors Art Smith and Herb Heffner. Smith is a good miler and 3000m runner, and Heffner is strong in the 800m. Steve Tolly, who took last semester off and did not compete indoors, will be defending his New England title in the 1000m.

Women's team: few new faces but a new look

By RICK SETO
Collegian Staff

When looking at the University of Massachusetts women's outdoor track team, it looks like it's had a facelift and a nosejob compared to last year's team. The strengths, which were once in the sprints and the jumps, have now in turn become weaknesses and now the throwers and the distances are the strengths.

The multi-talented Carla DeSantis, the school record-holder in the javelin and the New England runner-up last year, returns to spearhead a stronger and deeper group of throwers than last year.

The loss of Kari Fleischmann (the New England 100 meter dash champion), jumper Melissa Golembewski, and Mercedes Milligan is a great one, but new faces like Lee Ann Ambrose, Precious Hill, and Amy St. Pierre will be there to fill their shoes.

DeSantis said she has two goals: to be the New England and the ECAC javelin champion. Although she did have the longest throw in New England last year (158' 8'), she finished a disappointing second in the New Englands. She possesses rare athletic ability, doubling as a second-team All-America soccer goalie in the fall.

Ambrose is coming off a superb first season indoors as the New England runner-up in the 400. She will be doubling in the 200 and the 400, and coach Julie LaFreniere plans to run her in the 800 occasionally. But she adds, "We'll concentrate in the 400. I know she'll break 56 [seconds]." Ambrose herself has set a personal goal of breaking 55 seconds, which for argument's sake, would placed second in last year's New Englands.

According to LaFreniere, Hill, who finished third in the indoor New England 3000, will be running anywhere from the 800 to the 3000. LaFreniere says, "[Hill] might get to run a quicker, faster race, but the 3000 will probably be better for her.

When John Calipari took over as head basketball coach at the University of Massachusetts in 1988, one of his immediate goals was to bring UMass as close to the big time as possible.

The University took a big step toward that goal last night with an announcement that it will join the Springfield Civic Center and the Naismith Memorial Basketball Hall of Fame as hosts of a Division I holiday tournament for three seasons, beginning in 1990.

The first Hall of Fame Holiday Classic will be played Dec. 28-29, 1990, and will include UMass, Boston College, Northwestern and Dartmouth.

RSU protest over flag causes controversy

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
and ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police were called to the Student Union at noon yesterday to quell a disturbance which arose over the use of the American flag.

The flag had been taped to the floor in front of a Radical Student Union table promoting a panel discussion on the pending Supreme Court decision of Texas vs. Johnson.

Texas vs. Johnson is an appeal by the state of Texas to reinstate the conviction, which was overturned earlier by a Texas court of appeals, of Greg "Joey" Johnson, a member of the Revolutionary Communist Youth Brigade, for the burning of an American flag.

Members of the RSU and the Cambridge-based RCYB said they taped the flag to the floor to "protest what the flag stands for."

Students passing by sang the national anthem and threatened bodily harm to the people manning the table.

RSU member Dina Goodwill said, "I think they found the use of the flag and raising the question of what the flag stands for offensive."

Paul McGonnigal, a member of the UMass Republican Club and an editor of the Minuteman newspaper, said he became enraged by what he saw and ripped the flag off the floor and ran away only to be caught by the table's sponsors.

Police arrived and, having obtained a legal ruling from a Northampton district attorney which said trampling the flag was illegal, told former RSU member Joseph Rubin that he would have to remove the flag from the floor. Rubin agreed to move the flag under the table where it could not be stepped on.

As police discussed the use of the flag with Rubin, McGonnigal again grabbed the flag and ran from the scene. He was caught by police in the Campus Center parking garage and held for questioning. McGonnigal was later released after explaining his position.

"The American flag is a symbol of what this country stands for, right and wrong. To desecrate that is to desecrate everything that has made this country great. That is disgusting," McGonnigal said.

Dudley Bridges, director of Building Services, told RSU members that the table had to be taken down for safety reasons.

Rubin later accused the police and the administration of not respecting the First Amendment rights of the RSU and RCYB.

"The police were there and the administration was there but they were not about to defend people's First Amendment rights," he said.

'Record' voter turnout

Budget cuts and student senate problems cited

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Thousands of student voters flocked to the polls yesterday in what one election coordinator called the Student Government Association's largest undergraduate turnout in four years, stretching the release of election results well into last night.

Co-Elections Coordinator Holly Brod said she expects to be tallying the votes for SGA president and student trustee until 4 a.m. this morning. The Collegian plans to publish the results tomorrow.

"It's unbelievable," Brod said of the "record" turnout. "We are running out of everything."

Students waited in lines for as long as 20 minutes to cast their vote, causing ballot boxes at nearly all seven voting locations to overflow by mid-afternoon. Brod said she was forced to order an additional 1,000 ballots to the 6,000 already printed for the elections.

"We can't open the ballot boxes, they're so stuffed," she said.

Brod said she suspects the large turnout is in response to concern over state budget cuts and problems in the student senate, including the body's failure to ratify Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as SGA co-presidents.

"People have become really aware of the presence of the SGA," she said. "It seems that students feel the issues are their responsibility now."

The MassPIRG referendum question, that asked students if they wanted to continue the UMass chapter — which advocates for student rights, and fights pollution and toxic waste, may also have prompted the turnout, she said.

Many students said they did not mind waiting in line to vote, although the numbers stretched at times to more than 30 people in such poll locations as the Newman Center and the Student Union Ballroom.

"I'm hoping whoever becomes president will take care of the [student] senate — it's a farce right now," said senior Kathleen Schaufus. "If they care

Regents and trustees battle over higher ed. structure

By the Associated Press

HAVERHILL — The state's higher education board agreed yesterday to at least consider merging five state universities into one super university but moved ahead with its own plan calling for local university control.

What amounts to a power struggle between the state Board of Regents of Higher Education and the University of Massachusetts trustees remained unresolved.

But a majority of the regents have already indicated their support for making the University of Massachusetts at Boston a separate institution with its own president and board.

In a meeting at Northern Essex Community College, the regents officially rebuffed a bid by the UMass trustees to consolidate power. The trustees are considering a plan that would give them control over the University of Lowell and Southeastern Massachusetts University, in addition to the Amherst, Boston and Worcester campuses they now govern.

"The way that is recommended by the University of Massachusetts task force is the way of the past," said Higher Education Chancellor Franklyn Jenifer, referring to the UMass commission that recommended consolidation.

Conservatory, a therapeutic escape

By DEBORAH RITTER
Collegian Staff

"A great escape from life, turmoil" and a reference to the droppings from a male cow is the way one entry reads in the guestbook at the Durfee Conservatory. Other comments express similar, if less colloquial, appreciation.

Located adjacent to University Health Services and flanked by the Copper Beech trees (a gift from the Emperor of Japan) the conservatory has served the University of Massachusetts as a learning center and tourist attraction since the school was founded in 1867.

UMass students come to the conservatory to draw, identify, or simply enjoy the thousands of tropical plants there, said John Tristan, conservatory director since 1976.

Other visitors, among them were Isaac Asimov and Buckminster Fuller, come to admire the 100-year-old camellias, the 30-foot high fiddletree figs and miniature bonsais.

"This place is as much about people as it is about plants," Tristan said. "I want a hands-on atmosphere, not a museum for plants."

In keeping with this philosophy, Tristan has run a horticultural therapy program at the conservatory since 1980. Special-needs adolescents and refugees from Southeast Asia participate in an agenda designed to overcome social, emotional, and physical disabilities.

Clients in the program are referred to Tristan by social service agencies throughout the Pioneer Valley. Tristan, a board-certified horticultural therapist, limits the size of the groups so that everyone gets individualized attention.

Many of the sessions are devoted to crafts projects that utilize plants from the conservatory. Bamboo flutes, fishing poles, fans, wall screens, corsages, wreaths and

Pre-drafted letters fight cuts

By TOM CIAMPI
Collegian Correspondent

Washington Tower students began a letter-writing campaign yesterday, asking residents there to sign pre-written letters urging state representatives to increase spending for higher education.

The letter states that attending "the school has become increasingly more expensive," and that "vital services have been cut." The letter also said that Massachusetts ranks 41st in the country in terms of increased spending for higher education.

Three students, Stephen Finocchio, Maureen Dacey, and Cynthia Oxley, said they initiated the campaign out of personal concern.

"The campaign is just as important as rallying. Students should be calling their representatives and doing everything possible to let their voices be heard," Finocchio said.

Dacey said the three realized they could play an active role in getting the students' message to their representatives. They agreed that the campaign complements other actions taken by University of Massachusetts students to protest the more than $12 million cut from the University in the past year.

The residence hall houses about 600 students, and the three said they gathered 350 signatures between 4 and 6 p.m. yesterday in the tower's lobby. Oxley said that they will continue to gather signatures today.

Dacey said the letters will hopefully reach the representatives before an important vote on Monday. The vote, she said, is to determine state expenditures for higher education.

Oxley said the students received support and encouragement from the Student Government Association, who financed the campaign and drafted the letter.

Amherst set for salamander migration

AMHERST (AP) — Officials were bracing yesterday for what has become an annual rite of spring in this western Massachusetts collegetown - the migration of spotted salamanders across a town road.

Although several Massachusetts communities, including the city of Framingham and the town of Ashland, annually divert traffic so the salamanders can get to their breeding pools without getting squished by passing cars, few have embraced the six-inch amphibians with the enthusiasm of Amherst.

Last year, more than 200 volunteer salamander herders - about equal the number of salamanders - turned out for the soggy march that marks the first rainy spring night when temperatures climb over 40 degrees.

The town has even installed special salamander-scale tunnels, based on similar culverts used in Britain for migrating toads, under the road in hopes of easing their perilous passage. And road crews erect special "Salamander Crossing" signs designed by schoolchildren.

"It's great. It's nature at its best," said Stanley Ziomek, town public works superintendent, who admits to having a soft spot for the navy blue amphibians with the yellow polka dots.

He said that in anticipation of an early thaw, volunteer work crews, arranged by Robert Winston, an amateur naturalist, who has been helping the salamanders across the road for more than 12 years, were preparing to clear winter debris from the tunnels. Typically, the salamanders ease out of their winter burrows between mid-March and mid-April.

Winston said most of the salamanders used the tunnels after special mesh fences were installed to guide them to the openings last spring, and biologists are anxious to see how they will react this year. The tunnels are 18 inches wide, six inches high and topped with grates.

The state is also stepping up efforts to protect the salamander breeding grounds with a special certification program that would make at least some of the vernal pools eligible for protection from development under the state's wetlands protection laws, according to Peter Mireck of the state Division of Fisheries and Wildlife.

The pools, which are filled only during the wet seasons, are critical to many species, including salamanders and spring peepers, which need a breeding place where their eggs won't be eaten by fish, Mireck said.

EWC counseling to resume

Everywoman's Center to reinstate services

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

Counseling services at the Everywoman's Center, officially terminated in September and dormant since last spring, may be reinstated in the next month, the EWC director said yesterday.

Carol Wallace said the EWC has completed its search for a coordinator of the Counseling Program, and will formally offer the position to their first choice within the next few days.

The new coordinator would lead a practicum program, staffed by two or more counseling interns, she said. The interns are usually graduate students working toward a master's degree in social work, she said.

The counseling is scheduled to focus on women's issues from a feminist perspective, and would include but not be limited to dealing with eating disorders, relationships, self-esteem, and lesbian issues, Wallace said.

"This is a critical position and we're looking forward to being able to reinstate these services for women," she said.

When the full-time permanent position is filled, the EWC will be operating at full staff and counseling services will be completely restored, she said. The EWC has not operated at full staff since Wallace began working at the center in June, 1987, she said.

Wallace said she was notified yesterday morning that the Office of Student Affairs and the Affirmative Action Office approved the EWC's choice of a new coordinator. The actual hiring awaits only formal acceptance by the applicant, she said.

Wallace said the person chosen to fill the vacant coordinator's position is not a University of Massachusetts employee.

She would not name the new counselor until that person is first notified of the University's decision to hire her. Wallace said she expects the applicant to accept the counseling position.

In other police reports:

- Police said they responded to a possible disturbance or injury at a rally being held on the Student Union steps Tuesday. No injury was recorded on the police blotter, police said.
- A student was allegedly assaulted by another student on the 13th floor of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall Tuesday. Police said they obtained a description of the assailant and the victim was treated at the University Infirmary.

UMass loses advocate upon retirement this spring

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will be losing one of the school's greatest advocates this spring, when veteran administrator and teacher Gerry Grady retires.

Grady, 67, coordinator of community and alumni relations, has been with UMass for 30 years and has been a leader in the fight for the continued expansion of facilities and greater academic quality since his arrival in 1959.

Grady's first major contribution to UMass came in the early 1960s when the University had only 6,000 students and was classified as a state agency controlled from Boston, he said.

At that time there was a need for more colleges and universities in Massachusetts so Grady helped form a political lobbying group that petitioned the statehouse to free UMass from direct state control, Grady said.

The group succeeded in its efforts and UMass began to expand. The student population was allowed to grow by 1,500 a year, a building authority was set up to fund construction of dining commons, new residential areas such as Southwest, the stadium and other buildings as the control of UMass fell to Whitmore, he said.

"To help to make that possible was a challenge," he said. "What happened at UMass was a significant achievement and it was a lot of fun being caught up in that growth. [There] was the sense that we were doing things the right way, with class."

Grady has held many jobs in his time at the University, ranging from business manager in the early '70s, to teacher, through his present position which has given him the opportunity to bring the University and the town closer together, he said.

"I've worked hard on getting good relations between the town and the University," he said. "You have to develop good will and contacts [with the town] so when an issue develops you have the right tools to solve it."

Grady has long been involved with the town working on such community projects as the Lighting of the Merry Maple

Service provides reliable child care

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Staff

Each day, two local women are making sure children — from new borns to 12 year olds — have a safe place to stay while their parents are working.

Agnes Delgato and Carol Lee, directors of Western Mass Child Care in Holyoke, started this service for parents in February, 1988. Since the program started, they have placed 108 children in homes in Holyoke, Chicopee, and Springfield.

"We're both single parents," Delgato said. "I was once a day care provider, but I had a lot of people waiting to get their kids into my house. I wanted to expand it and turn it into a bigger service for families."

Parents bring their children to the child care center and Lee and Delgato locate a home where the child can stay while the parent is working, looking for work, or attending school. If a parent does not meet one of these criteria, their child is not eligible for the program, Delgato said.

Each home can take as many as six children at a time, Delgato said, adding that the care-takers are volunteers.

Lee said 75 percent of the children come from low-income families. The program accepts child care vouchers, and the flat fee is $23 a day regardless of how many children a parent may bring in, she said.

"A large percentage of teenagers who have had babies are applying for child care," Delgato said. "The kids need to return to school within six weeks for welfare to provide child care. A lot of companies are the same way." Because of this time limit, parents need to quickly find a safe place for their children, she said.

Delgato said their service helps parents as well as children. "We want to be able to help mothers get off welfare and get their independence by getting them back to school or to work," she said.

"That's where the real aspect of our job is," Lee said. "Getting women to regain their independence."

The center has been such a success that Delgato and Lee want to expand, and are in the process of trying to get an infant house in Holyoke. The home would service only babies, from newborns to 6 months. The women have sent out flyers and press releases asking for donations, such as high chairs, cribs, baby food, and car seats from the community. However, Delgato said the response has been almost nonexistent. "People always say they want to help, but no one is coming forth," she said.

In the fall, Delgato and Lee hope to open a day care program for sick children. "This would be a home a child could go to if they were mildly ill and their parents had to go to work," Delgato said.

To make this project successful, the center would need registered nurses to care for the children. "Maybe a retired nurse would open her home to take in some kids one day a week," she said.

LSC looks to administration for help

By TOM CIAMPI
Collegian Correspondent

Efforts to regain some litigation power for the Legal Services Center were renewed last week when a letter was sent to Chancellor Joseph Duffey from two campus organizations, requesting student-administration dialogue concerning students' legal needs.

Joanne Mei, a member of the Legal Services Center governing board, said the letter, co-drafted by the Graduate Student Senate, asks for informal meetings with the chancellor and other members of the administration.

The intent of the meetings, she said, is to find out if the chancellor is willing to support student groups in their effort to persuade the Board of Trustees into granting some litigation power to the LSC.

Duffey said in a telephone interview recently that he would agree to the dialogue. "I do plan to respond affirmatively and begin the conversation," he said, adding that he welcomed the chance to investigate the legal needs of the students and to present realistic proposals to the Board of Trustees.

"We ought to start looking at what we could do together to go to the trustees and say 'this is reasonable,'" he said.

The trustees have the power to reject any proposal suggested by the administration, Mei said. The trustees rescinded the LSC's power to sue the University in 1986, and rescinded all litigation power in 1987. The LSC currently offers only legal advice and referrals to students.

Mei said that the LSC in its current capacity cannot meet students' legal needs. She said that students cannot afford lawyers off-campus, and that many lawyers are not willing to represent students, especially in tenant disputes in which local lawyers have already sided with landowners.

"It's a good time to work on student-administration relations," she said. "The administration wants a lot from students now. They want us to be supportive of the campus against budget cuts. Are they willing to trust us and give us back a valuable service?"

Sea a major influence in Greek culture

By NANCY COHEN

The Mediterranean and the Aegean seas were supreme in determining much of Greece's culture, professor Speros Vryonis in the Campus Center said last Thursday.

In the lecture "The Greeks and the Sea," Vryonis described the relationship between this ancient culture and the sea around it as of "intimate relations — not new, but rather a recent manifestation throughout the history of the Greeks."

Nature, most importantly the sea, influences every aspect of life within the Greek realm, politically, economically and culturally, Vryonis said. The Greeks "were a people originally landlocked," he said. "[They] adapted their bodies, souls and minds to the sea."

"By the eighth to sixth century B.C. there were over 120 Greek colonies stretching from Gibraltar to Mesopotamia," Vryonis said.

"The sea gave them [the Greeks] freedom of movement," he said, and gave them the means whereby they "instituted the Hellenic way of life to the area."

Vryonis cited the importance of viewing the sea as not just an economic influence, but also a literary one as well. To emphasize this, Vryonis read from many sources of literature, including poetry, fables and mythology.

He said that not only did the Greeks adapt to "dominion over travel on the sea," but under it as well, making "the undersea world a part of their culture." Therefore creating stems for the origins of Greek mythology, he said.

The lecture was part of a series of events arranged by the Hellenic Student Association. According to Spilios Livanos, president of the HSA, both the lecture and the turnout for the forum were above the group's expectations.

Deaf, hard of hearing students cope with academic obstacles

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Donna Demers, of Services for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing, calls a student with a teletype (TTY) machine.

Freshman liberal arts major Rick Humphreys has more to deal with than grades. A deaf student, interpreters cannot give him much help beyond the classroom.

"I think that other people have trouble accepting me as a friend," he said. "I try to get along with other hearing people. I try to communicate with sign [language], but they don't know what to do. They back off."

Humphreys said he spends little of his leisure time in his Dwight House room, preferring the company of another deaf student in Southwest.

"I try to interact with people on my floor, with other people in my dorm, but they're scared. You know, uncomfortable. I'm taking my time and letting them be themselves," he said.

His roommate, Dan Anderson, said communication between the two is rarely a problem. "He's a really nice person, so it isn't hard to live with him," he said.

"This is my first semester living with him, and things have been fine so far," Anderson said. "We haven't had any fights yet, just the communication problem. And that's not really a problem, just something you have to work around. It takes a lot of patience — on both sides."

Donna Demers, coordinator of Services for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing at the University of Massachusetts, said about 15 students on campus use services provided by her office. Sign language and oral interpretation, as well as tutoring and note taking, are the most prominent of these services, she said.

On the University's admissions application, there is space for students to identify themselves as deaf or hard of hearing, but Demers said students on campus do not always choose to do so.

"It's not automatic," she said. "It's totally up to the student. If they need help, hopefully they'll come to us."

Students with hearing disabilities have a wide variety of needs, she said, adding that the University is required, under Section 504 of the Massachusetts General Law, to provide the services offered by her office.

"The underlying significance of Section 504 is that we have to stress diversity," she said.

In addition to interpretational services, the University provides much of the hardware necessary for survival.

> "Not so many years ago – in my lifetime – people who were deaf were often institutionalized mistakenly for being mentally retarded: 'If you can't understand me, if you refuse to answer me, if you can't pass the test, you must be retarded.'"
> –Donna Demers

"Physical Plant is wonderful here in terms of providing adaptations to rooms: doorbell lights, visual smoke and fire detectors," she said. Flashing lights that indicate when the telephone is ringing are helpful in ways that persons with normal hearing take for granted, she said.

"If you can't hear the phone ringing, it can drive your roommates crazy, it can drive your neighbors crazy, it can drive yourself crazy if you're waiting for an important phone call," she said. Humphreys' residence hall room is equipped with a flashing fire alarm.

The University does not provide for all the needs of deaf and hard of hearing students, however. Closed-captioned televisions and teletype (TTY) machines, which are required by deaf persons for normal telephone conversations, are needed all over campus, she said.

"We really need to increase consciousness and dollars dedicated to providing TTYs to important places on campus," she said. "The information desk [in the Campus Center] is working on installing a TTY over there, but imagine all the hotel guests, all the people visiting here for conferences in the Campus Center."

"There's no way they [deaf and hard of hearing persons] can have access to a public telephone without a TTY," she said. We need to do that. We're technically inaccessible without those things."

Thus, if deaf and hard of hearing students want to use these devices, they must pay for it themselves, she said.

"It's expensive to be disabled. It costs a lot more. You have to pay more money for long distance phone calls. I mean, you sit there and type [on the TTY]. A lot of people type a lot more slowly than they can talk."

The Massachusetts Rehabilitation Commission offers tuition support to eligible students as well as assistance to offset the costs of necessary devices, she said.

Demers said these students have to have extra motivation to take care of their daily activities. As a deaf person, she said, "not only do you go to class with an interpreter, but you have to rely on other people's notes because obviously you can't look at the interpreter, look at the board and look at the notes at the same time. That means a lot extra time finding someone who's a good notetaker."

There is a feeling of camaraderie among deaf students, Humphreys said.

"We share the same problems and the same language," he said. Demers said the term "deaf" refers to persons who cannot hear at all while "hard of hearing" implies some hearing ability.

"Hard of hearing" is preferred over "hearing impaired" among people with that problem because the latter phrase stresses a deficiency, she said.

American sign language is the primary language of most deaf persons, Demers said. This language differs from English, she said.

"They're two distinct languages," she said. "So to study, to read those fat textbooks, I mean, you may be studying in a second language. It takes a lot more time and people don't realize that not all deaf people are really fluent in English and not all deaf people read lips."

Humphreys, who does read lips, said one of the hardest aspects of communication is trying to understand people who speak quickly. Interpreters only accompany him to class, he said. Demers said interpreters assist deaf and hearing impaired people in a limited number of activities and were not available until recently.

"Not so many years ago — I mean in my lifetime," she said, "people who were deaf were often institutionalized mistakenly for being mentally retarded: 'If you can't understand me, if you refuse to answer me, if you can't pass the test, you must be retarded.' Boom, you're placed in an institution and in the last five years, people are still being identified in institutions and being pulled out."

Humphreys has spent most of his life attending a deaf school. Two years ago, he was transferred to Northampton High School, or "mainstreamed." He said the University offers much more assistance to him.

Demers said people in the entire University community need to help fight the uphill battle being fought by the deaf community.

"There's a lot there that we often take for granted and we don't think about," she said. "I think the deaf and hard of hearing students here really are outstanding."

ceremony held every December on the Amherst town common.

During the last two years of the ceremony, in which a large Maple tree is drapped in white lights, Grady said he "was Santa Claus, dressed in a suit my children gave me."

Although working with the town is important, Grady's greatest joy comes from his involvement with students, he said.

An avid fan of the football team and marching band, he has helped fund raise for football and has been working for years to get the band greater recognition, he said.

Also Grady created a group called Students Advocating Financial Aid which travels to Washington every year to lobby Congress for increased financial aid.

Grady gets involved because he believes in experiencing all facets of college life, and his work with students has allowed him to instill this belief in others, he said.

"As a student, lead a full life," he said. "There's fantastic opportunities on this campus that you'll never have again in your life. If you spend too much time eating and drinking and fooling around, things that can be done anywhere" an important part of your education will be wasted.

Grady suggested getting involved in campus groups or organizing dorm parties as a good way to meet people and to feel like a part of the UMass community.

An active member of the Amherst community Grady said he has no plans to be idle in retirement and will continue to work closely with the football team, marching band, and the town.

Steve Lacy's sax a high note in jazz innovation

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Correspondent

Steve Lacy is the most important soprano saxophonist in jazz today. He inherits that distinction from the first two ackowledged soprano masters, Sidney Bechet and John Coltrane. He stands above better-known latter-day sopranoists such as Wayne Shorter and Branford Marsalis for his individuality, artistic integrity and adventurousness. Uniquely, Lacy has devoted his entire career to an instrument that is usually considered "secondary." All of this makes it very much worth seeing him with his working quintet at the Iron Horse in Northampton next Monday night.

Valley Jazz

Lacy started out as a Dixieland-style player, in the manner of Bechet, but in the 1950's, he became the first sopranoist to play in the more modern style. In fact, he claims to have inspired Coltrane to pick up the small horn. Lacy was influenced towards more "free" playing by piano iconoclast Cecil Taylor, with whom he worked in the mid-1950's. Taylor recommended that he listen to Thelonious Monk, and Lacy became fascinated: he devoted the next several years almost exclusively to playing Monk's compositions, and convinced Monk to hire him during the summer of 1960.

After his tenure with Monk, Lacy found (as did many other like-minded musicians) that work in the US was scarce, so he left for Europe, where he has lived to this day; he makes his home in Paris. As usual with such expatriate musicians, Europe's gain is our loss: he has become one of the most important jazz artists over there, but his recorded output in the States has been meager. Until recently, in fact, he has had only one domestic release in 25 years.

Luckily, American jazz fans are now more able to discover his excellent music. Since 1987, several Lacy albums have been released in the US, mostly on European labels imported by Polygram (Soul Note, Sound Aspects) but also on the domestic RCA/Novus label. Two of these are intimate duet settings for soprano sax and piano (Mal Waldron and Gil Evans), while the others feature various permutations of his working group. Fantasy has also been re-issuing some of his early albums as part of their Original Jazz Classics series. He has been performing in the States regularly during the past few years.

Lacy should be counted among the most adventurous musicians in jazz, but one never sees him on the "short list" along with Taylor, Coltrane, Ornette Coleman, etc. There are several reasons for this, none of them very convincing: first, of course, he has been out of the country for so long. Second, his approach to innovation is more subtle and less controversial than those of the musicians named above. Third, some find his obvious intellectualism off-putting - he has written vocal works based on Melville and Lao-Tze, and has cited abstract visual artists such as painter Paul Klee and sculptor Alberto Giacometti as influences.

Despite his eclecticism, Lacy's consistency over the more than one hundred albums he has recorded is quite high. The common threads are Lacy's pure, vibratoless tone on soprano sax, his perfectionist approach to improvisation and the amazing, telepathic cohesiveness of his working group. See him at the Iron Horse Monday night, and enjoy an overlooked innovator in jazz. After you've heard Steve Lacy, you'll recognize his sound instantly whenever you hear him again. And you'll definitely want to.

Cajun style at Eastside

Eastside Grille
Northampton
(Raw bar with full liquor license, wheelchair accessible)

The Eastside Grille, located in downtown Northampton, offers great food, a warm and comfortable atmosphere and friendly, attentive service. The restaurant doesn't take reservations, so you may want to get there early as the wait for a table can be anywhere from a few minutes to an hour and a half.

Dining Out

Formerly an old town tavern, the Eastside Grille opened just three years ago. Its renovation and expansion has created a very clean, comfortable restaurant, while still maintaining much of the detail and special feeling of its former self. The restaurant has three main areas: the bar, which is located in the center, and two separate dining areas, situated on either side of the bar.

The room to the left of the bar is spacious yet cozy, and has a finished, classic look. The room in which the bar is located was built in the 1920's, its original decor sets the feeling for the entire restaurant. The second dining room is an extension from the recent renovations. It has a contemporary feel with white walls and spacious hunter green booths. The brass fixtures and natural wood detail give this room a special softness that complements its modern style.

Waiting for a table, we enjoyed shrimp cocktail and drinks at the bar. The bar offers draft beer, wine by the glass or bottle, and any liquor drink you may want. Shrimp cocktail and little necks are priced at 75 cents each or six for $4.25. Oysters are 85 cents each and six for $4.95.

Once seated, the menu is very inviting. It includes beef, seafood and poultry, all prepared in a variety of styles. Many of the dishes are prepared Cajun style, a very spicy, southern cooking style whose origins are traced to Louisiana. Food, however, may be ordered as spicy as specified by the customer.

Prices for dinner entrees range from $4.25 for a sirloin burger to $13.95 for grilled salmon steak. One of the main dishes included on the menu is the chicken ettoufee, which is pieces of chicken smothered in a tangy brown, spicy Cajun sauce. This dish was very tasty and can also be ordered with shrimp. A large and lean portion of delmonico steak is offered at $11.95. Steaks are served with a choice of gorgonzola sauce, horseradish or bernaise sauce. The barbecue shrimp is also excellent, it is cooked in the same Cajun style and is very tasty. Shrimp is offered in many styles. The shrimp in dijon mustard sauce, for $9.95, is highly recommended.

Most of the dinner entrees are served with rice and the vegetable of the day. A salad and fresh bread are also included. Desserts, which include lemon meringue pie, chocolate mousse, cake and an outrageous mud pie, are simple, but big.

The Eastside Grille is a sure choice for an excellent meal, whether for lunch, a quick dinner before a movie or a full course meal. Located at 19 Strong Avenue in Northampton, the Eastside Grille is open daily for lunch from 11:30 to 3:00, and for dinner Sunday to Thursday, 5:00 to 10:00 p.m. and Friday and Saturday, 5:00 to 11:00.

Purgatory, a cue for laughs

Maid of Athens/Two Guys Named Jon
Emily Dickinson Hall, Hampshire College

All forty-one seats were filled in Emily Dickinson Hall's Studio Theater at Hampshire College on March 9, 10 and 11, for the production of Just A Few Moments In Purgatory, Then I'll Be Moving On To Hell. The two comedies shown were The Maid of Athens, written and directed by Division III student Jennifer McMaster, and Two Guys Named Jon, created by UMass student Jon Duquette and Division III student Jon Garber.

Theater

The Maid of Athens starring Christa Crewdson as Sara and Valerie Solof as Camille, concerns the relationship that develops when Sara, an artist who has isolated herself both emotionally and physically, is suddenly visited by a flamboyant muse, Camille. Though the acting was good, the storyline of this play was very vague and abstract. Valerie Solof did a great job and her superior performance kept the play alive, when it would have otherwise failed.

This comedy did have a few humorous moments, but it didn t bring tears of laughter to my eyes as did Two Guys Named Jon. Of this second piece it will suffice to say that "Theater is hell and television is hell, but along the way this two man finds the humor in it all." The two Jons' exceptional acting and Quick wit provided for a successful, fast-paced play.

The piece opens with an audition and Duquette's various interpretations of Shakespeare's "the world is one big stage" kept the audience laughing throughout. Jon's "Dustin Hoffian," "Katherine Hepburnian" and "William Shatnerian" impersonations were fabulous.

Duquette is sent to hell for bad acting, removing a tag from a mattress and other obscure reasons. The two Jons go on to reinact a scene from Romeo and Juliet until interrupted by Rosalie Garber, Jon's mom, who wants to "see some hell." And Hell is what she gets. With the hell lighting on, and with devil's horns on his forehead, Jon garber hosts the game show "Hotter than Hell" a take-off of Jeopardy. This is a clever scene in which Duquette stands behind a prop which makes him look as if he's in a pan on the stove. When he answers incorrectly or fails to answer in the form of a hyperbole, Jon is fried.

Duquette and garber's creative interpretations of acting, theater and television are summed up at the end of the play in their talk show at "Satan's Hideaway." In John Davidson style they end by singing a host of songs including "Celebration," "New York, New York," and the Love Boat theme song.

Liasons is a Close shave for Malcovitch

Dangerous Liaisons
Mt. Farms Theaters

As everyone probably knows by now, Rainman is almost a show-in to win best picture. I've seen all of the movies nominated, and in my opinion, Steven Frears' Dangerous Liaisons should be the winner. It's brilliant. I can't remember the last time I've seen a movie that was so uniformly well made.

Film Review

John Malkovich (The Killing Fields) stars with Glenn Close (Fatal Attraction) in a lusty, clever movie about seduction and deceit in pre-revolutionary France. Close plays the Marquise de Merteuil, whose one goal in life is to "dominate the male species, and avenge her own." To this end, she has engaged and continues to engage in numerous affairs with any man she chooses. She reasons that the main satisfaction a man gleans from such affairs is in bragging about it later. Through a mixture of blackmail and ingenious planning, she makes it so they can't tell.

However, in one of her past affairs, her lover ran off with the lover of another practitioner of deceit; the Viscount de Valmont. She invites the Viscount to her chalet where they plan to take revenge on her ex-lover.

He has plans to marry Madame de Tourvelle (marvelously played by Michelle Pfeiffer); a chaste young woman who has lived all her life in a monastery and who praises virtue above all else. He is also semi-obsessed with virtue. The Viscount is not. To say he gets around is an understatement. He has affairs almost constantly and agrees to disgrace Madame de Tourvelle in exchange for one night of passion with the Marquise de Marteuil.

Even if this doesn't win Best Picture, it will certainly win Best Costumes. The corsets and powdered wigs along with the apparent ease of the actors in wearing them make one believe he's really seeing a portion of 18th century life; and the lives these characters lead are very interesting.

The movie's dialogue is witty and very clever. Many of the conversations Close and Malkovich have are so sharp that, after the movie, I felt like I'd been freshly shaved. Sexual innuendo is used frequently such as when the Marquise says to the Viscount, "Perhaps we need to do something to stiffen his resolve. . . among other things." There are more twists in the movie than in a coiled rattlesnake . . . and twice the venom.

Stop negative Asian stereotypes

As concerned members of the Five College South Asian community, we are shocked and angered by the emergence of racist slander directed at us. We refer to a parody of an advertisement published by The Minuteman on page 6 of its March 20, 1989 edition.

The "advertisement" was an attack directed at Anuj Bhogilal, an Indian student who holds a position with the Third World Caucus. The publishers of this magazine, in an effort to attack Bhogilal's views on SGA internal affairs, used deliberate racist imagery to caricature South Asians. It depicted Bhogilal as an emaciated South Asian holding a begging bowl, and paternally described him as a starving, helpless child. The advertisement carried a disclaimer in small print clarifying that it was a "parody."

Small print disclaimers can never legally justify racist slander and defamation.

There are hundreds of Bangladeshi, Indian, Nepali, Pakistani and Sri Lankan students at the Five College campuses. We are not children with begging bowls and have sufficient intelligence to recognize racist stereotyping when we see it.

We urge The Minuteman to settle its political differences with members of our community in the appropriate forums and to refrain from attempts to denigrate us.

Unfortunately, The Minuteman is only a symptom of a deep-rooted disease. We also express concern over the rising tide of anti-Islamic caricaturing in the Collegian's biased and distorted coverage of the Salmon Rushdie affair.

We have good reason to doubt whether the Collegian truly cares about South Asian expatriate writers or the problems with which they grapple. Perhaps the self-righteous indignation evidenced by the Collegian in its sudden spate of over a dozen articles, editorials and cartoons on the issues, reflects not legitimate concern over a death threat, but an opportunity to depict Islamic people as violent and irrational.

We appeal to all concerned South Asians (students, faculty, and community) and supporters to attend a meeting on Wednesday, March 29 at 7pm in the Campus Center to decide on an appropriate response to these attacks.

Speak out now before this cancer spreads.

Forms of racism overlooked

I appreciated K. Andrew Mitchell's column on racism ("Public Safety leaves Black students open to harm," March 13). However, by comparing his racist attackers to "a tribe of spear-wielding Indians" he is perpetuating a racist sterotype of Native American's. I am sure that Mitchell meant no harm. The stereotyping of Native Americans is so ingrained in our culture that many of us don't see it for what it is. I think that it is the most overlooked form of racism.

Visit filled with surprises

In dread, I waited for Saturday night to arrive. I would have to spend the best party night of the week alone with my grandmother at her home in Malden. Oh swell, I thought, another evening of boring conversation and humdrum television programs while Lance and Adam, my buddies, were out having a good time. I tried to talk to my parents about visiting Grandma some other time, but they insisted it had been long enough since I last visited her. So, I gave up my protest and decided to live with the fact that I had to go. What I dreaded most about visiting Grandma was the sloppy kisses she plants all over my face and those bone-crushing hugs that always accompany her greetings.

Scott Green

All too soon, Saturday night arrived. I pulled up in front of Grandma's apartment, took a deep breath and got out. I knocked on her window like I always did and waited...and waited...and waited. Click-click. Grandma was unlocking the bolt on the opposite side of the door. I braced myself for what was about to happen. In an instant, the door swung open to reveal an all-familiar grin. (Here comes the nut-cracker, I thought.)

'Hello darling!'

'Umf!' (There goes the nut.) This was all I managed to say as she gave me her 'superhug'.

"Come on in," she cried cheerfully.

Well, I thought, the worst is over.

Grandma and I sat down and had dinner while carrying on some conversation. She asked me the usual barrage of questions, sometimes two or three times each: 'How do I feel? How is Traci, (my girlfriend)? When are we getting married? How is school? How do I feel? Is my mother still working? How do I feel?'

'I feel fine Grandma!'

'Your spine? Oh my goodness! What is the matter with your spine, dear?' If this is what old age does to you, I thought, I never want to grow old.

After dinner, she brought out fudge brownies and put some water in the kettle for her after-dinner tea. As she sat back down at the table, she sandwiched my face between her wrinkled hands.

'Eat, you are too skinny my darling, eat.' Feeling uneasy about this topic, I redirected the conversation. 'Grandma,' I asked, 'tell me about the war.'

She ran her hand through her thick grey hair and seemed to travel to another world as her eyes filled with the pain of years past.

'I remember. Our family was very poor, but happy. I must have been about twelve years old when Germany started gaining power and becoming a threat to little Poland. My father knew of Hitler and foresaw what would become of the Polish Jews if Hitler decided to invade Poland. So, my father, your great-grandfather, tried to arrange for my younger sister and I to escape to America to live with his brother. I got permission to go in time enough, but my sister wasn't so lucky. She was such a beautiful girl. After I left, the Nazis came and took both my parents and my sister away. I never heard from them again. I still miss them so much.'

Grandma stopped talking and stared blindly at the window. She slumped in her chair as the weight of her sadness grew heavy upon her shoulders. I was beginning to feel uneasy. The teapot's whistle made her jump a bit, bringing her out of her trance. She stood up, poured us some tea and returned with a sweet smile.

After watching the news and finishing our tea, I announced that it was time to return home. She thanked me for coming over, and I thanked her as well. Wishing me a safe trip home, she embraced me with her usual vigor; however, I didn't feel uncomfortable this time. We said our goodbyes, and I walked to the car. She was waving to me from the doorway. As I started for home, I glanced back to find her still waving. I couldn't help but think that as she was waving to me, she was reaching deep inside herself, dusting off those disheartening memories of long ago.

While driving home, a feeling of satisfaction engulfed me. I caught myself smiling, and it was then that I knew I was glad I had visited Grandma this evening.

A dispatch from Cutback City

Now, more than ever, students will have to make themselves heard loud and clear.

On Friday, our state representatives added insult to injury. Not only have the governor and the state house short changed the people of this state with the upcoming budget, but they did not even accept the so-called Rosenberg amendment which would have added a much needed $20 million to public higher education.

Maybe we were not loud enough at the state house last Tuesday. Maybe they just don't take us seriously. Or maybe they don't even understand what the hell is going on here. . .

Whatever we so at this point, the battle for the future of our university is going to be an uphill one. We'll have to use every means at our disposal to make our voices heard. Students for A Democratic University are offering you a direct way to do so.

First and foremost, you can join Cutback City by building your own shack or simply spending the night in one that's already there. The campus is big, there's room for everyone. When the campus is filled with shacks and shack dwellers, maybe folks our there will take notice.

Cutback City is also sponsoring a petition drive to invite state representatives to come and spend the night with us. This would be the perfect opportunity to give these people an "insider's tour" of the campus. Stop by and sign it. Meanwhile, we are sponsoring a teach in on the cutbacks on the state higher education on Tuesday at 6:30pm at the Cape Cod Lounge.

Come and join in, study and resist. . .

The 21st year: It can only go downhill from here

The world was different when I woke up this morning. The sun seemed to shine brighter through the venetian blinds in my bedroom. It was probably just my imagination, or maybe my new perspective on life. I felt as if I had just emerged from a cocoon. Or like Tom Hanks, in the movie "Big," who went to bed a boy and woke up in the morning and stared into his mirror to find a grown adult. Yeh, I could relate to that.

Why? I turned 21 today.

"It's just a birthday," I thought. Why should the fact that I'm a year older make me a different breed of species than I was before? What is it about this magical checkpoint in life that everyone talks so wildly about?

I've been through these stages of life before. I started checking my head for grey hairs the minute I turned 10. "Wow, I've been on this planet for an entire decade."

Eventually, I grew accustomed to being too old to play in a backyard sandbox or roam around on the front lawn with Matchbox cars and Tonka trucks. I'd have to revise my thinking, reach for loftier goals.

Thirteen was next in line. That word "teenager" seems to hold a certain power to it that starts to break down the child image. It's a person's first step toward becoming a responsible person. While 13 is supposed to be an unlucky number, it seemed like such a great number at that time.

And down the line it went. Sweet 16 was nice, getting a driver's permit, being allowed out on weekends and such, and 18 marked a dramatic breaking point, the end of high school and the start of the "adult" life, be it college or the working world.

Jim Clark

But 21? Incredible. This is the ultimate goal.

Each of those previous birthdays brought with them their own characteristics which made them special. But this one is the biggie. No longer will downtown Amherst mean just Bart's Ice Cream, or AlBum's. Now I have the expressed written consent of some higher being to explore those infamous "sin bins," the bars and clubs, which have become an almost prerequisite part of the college experience.

My driver's license takes on a new look, as well. Not only is there a glowing aura to it that I've never noticed before, but even the mandatory ugly picture looks better. This is the ticket to adventure everyone craves.

But what's next? Before now, there always seemed to be something else. A new height at which I could aim, enough to take the staleness out of life.

But this is it. Twenty-one seems to be the limit, the cutoff point where no more privileges can be doled out. The rest of the road seems destined to be the dreaded course our elders speak of. With college graduation just around the corner, I will be resigned to struggle in the working world for the majority of my remaining existence. Time will continue to roll on. Responsibility will be heaped on me. I will never get any younger.

Maybe this is the beginning of the end. Maybe I'm better off staying young and free to play with Tonka trucks on my front lawn again . . .

NAAAAAH!

terrariums are some of the items that have been created during therapy.

"Our people get a great sense of accomplishment when they make something, bring it home and perhaps give it as a gift," Tristan said. "It creates a basis for further achievements."

> Echoing with calls of doves and parakeets, the room boasts of a 40-foot pool stocked with colorful fish, lushly overgrown plants and an iguana.

Some clients get vocational training at the conservatory. Tristan teaches them the importance of maintaining a schedule, interacting with others, and performing labor that can be done elsewhere. Alumni of the horticultural training program now work at area businesses such as Louis' Foods and Stop and Shop.

Tristan's work with refugees began in 1984, when he accepted referrals who were having difficulty adjusting to American culture and New England winters.

"When people from Southeast Asia first come in here," he said, "you can literally see the relief in their faces. The tropical environment in the greenhouses has a strong physical presence, and it's very familiar to them."

"It's also a non-threatening environment," Tristan said. "Their culture teaches them not to talk about their problems, so other kinds of Western-style therapy are too aggressive."

"My approach is to let them hang out here and relax. When they're ready to talk I'm here to listen."

The Jungle Room is the favorite of clients and visitors alike. Echoing with the calls of doves and parakeets, the room boasts of a 40-foot pool stocked with colorful fish, lushly overgrown plants and an iguana.

"People always ask for a monkey," Tristan said. "I guess if someone donates one, then we'll have one. We get all the animals through donation because I have no budget to speak of to run this place."

Tristan said he relies heavily on donations and bartering to maintain and improve the greenhouses. He said he also tries to keep the conservatory's environment as safe and natural as possible.

"I use a minimum of pesticides in here," he said. "I try to show that you don't need all that crap on plants."

There are various cash crop specimens grown at Durfee, including pineapples, papayas, and "wonder lemons" which grow to the size of softballs. Tristan said most of the fruit is fed to the iguana, but admits that he and his assistants sometimes eat the papayas.

Pointing to a plant that appeared to be covered with red rice, Tristan said, "I save these for the wise guys. They're firecracker peppers, the hottest in the world. Some guys came in here drunk one time. I dared the biggest and loudest one to bite into one of these teeny things. All of a sudden he had to leave, probably to get more beer to put the fire out."

Tristan said he rewards more sedate visitors with the scents of jasmine and orchids. He plans to continue to expand the collection of plants and animals.

Anyone wishing to donate a monkey will be greatly appreciated, he said.

Ask Us...

Question: When is a woman most likely to become pregnant?

Answer: A woman can become pregnant after any single act of sexual intercourse. While it is true that ovulation, the release of an egg from a woman's ovary, is most likely to occur mid way through her cycle (ranging from 14 to 17 days after the beginning of her last period).

The fact is that ovulation can occur at any time, even during menstruation. Pregnancy can occur following ovulation and that is why it is important to use contraception every time you have sexual intercourse.

Question: Is it safe to have sex with my girlfriend when she's having her period?

Answer: Yes, but always use contraception. A woman can get pregnant at any time during her cycle. For some women it helps alliveate cramps. If your partner uses a diaphragm, it will temporarily stop menses flow, but it should not be left in for an extended length of time. (It may increase the risk of Toxic Shock Syndrome.)

Use a condom and remove the diaphragm after about three hours. Oral sex is safe as well. A dental dam — 6-inch square of latex which covers the entire vulva — can be used to cut down transmission of STDs and HIV antibodies.

about the issues they'll take care of the issues and leave politics out of it."

John Harold, a senior, was the last person in a line of more than 20 voters at the Student Union yesterday but said he was willing to wait.

"I really want to vote because I'm concerned about the budget cuts," Harold said. Also, he added, "The student senate and the SGA should be more responsible to the students. Unless people vote, they won't feel that way."

The Greek area poll, stationed in Newman Center, also increased its turnout, receiving about 500 voters — a substantial increase from last year's figure of 110, said Milind Bharvirkar, president of the Interfraternity Council.

"This year, the Greek Areas really come out and wants to take part in the SGA, from budget cuts to elections," Bharvirkar said.

Attempts to register students to vote in upcoming Amherst elections also proved successful when more than 135 students added their names to the list at a table in the center, he said.

"We're trying to get representation from UMass in the town because of the many school issues discussed there," Bharvirkar said, citing the town's alcohol policy leading to the prohibition of tailgating before football games as a major concern.

■ regents and trustees meet

"We do not believe in one authority at the top, but authority at the best place where it can be used," Jenifer said.

Regent Mary Lou Anderson said the UMass proposal would create a two-headed system with regents governing 24 colleges and community colleges and UMass trustees running the five university campuses.

"It would put us in a very schizophrenic position," Anderson said.

UMass trustees Chairman Gordon Oakes appealed to the regents to delay their proposal, urging them to set up a committee of trustees and regents to study the two plans and make recommendations.

"The thrust of the (regents') report is to fragment the university by spinning off the Boston campus as a separate institution," Oakes said. "I would strongly urge that we would take our time on this matter."

Oakes said that he had consulted with other trustees and said they have "serious reservations" about the regents' report.

The regents rejected Oakes' proposal, but regents Chairman Paul Tsongas agreed to have some informal meetings with UMass trustees to discuss the issue.

The regents are scheduled to take a final vote on their plan on May 9. Although it has not received official approval of the regents, the draft plan itself was prepared by a regents' subcommittee consisting of a majority of the board.

And comments from individual regents have indicated strong support for the decentralization concept.

"There is no question in our minds that the national model is moving briskly toward decentralization," said Regent Paul Marks.

WRATH OF GRAPES – David Wheaton re-crates Chilean grapes at the Cavalier Gulling and Wilson produce company in Cleveland yesterday after fears of cyanide contamination in fruit from the country has prompted many grocers to pull it off the shelves.

Court censures judge

BOSTON (AP) – Norfolk County Probate Judge Robert M. Ford's dual role as president of an animal rights group to benefit himself, his friends and relatives brought public censure, a record $75,000 fine and suspension of his court administrative duties from the Massachusetts Supreme Court yesterday.

The 63-year-old jurist's favoritism in making numerous lucrative court appointments to friends and relatives involved with the New England Anti-Vivisection Society, which he headed, "tended to shake public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary," the court wrote.

Ford received $102,708 in compensation for his part-time work for the animal rights group between 1983 and 1986, while also receiving a judicial salary of $71,520 yearly.

The high court said that while the organization was considered a charitable institution, Ford and others conducted the group's affairs "in a manner designed to bring economic advantage to himself, his family and his friends."

Ford, a judge since 1967, will be allowed to continue to hear probate and Family Court cases. But, as first judge of the Norfolk Court Family Probate and Family Court since 1975, his administrative duties have been suspended indefinitely.

The $75,000 assessment by the court is the largest ever levied by the justices against a judge, Supreme Court spokeswoman Joan Kenney said.

Ford, of Cohasset, was on vacation and could not be reached for comment yesterday, his office said.

The high court acted on an investigation by the Judicial Conduct Commission begun two years ago concerning Ford's extensive activities with the Anti-Vivisection Society, an organization opposed to the use of animals in certain kinds of medical research.

The commission said that while Ford was a member of the organization from 1963 or 1964 until his resignation in 1987 - during which time he served for several years as president - the organization "progressed and advanced under the judge's direction; that the judge performed his full share of judicial and administrative duties . . .; and that the judge's NEAVS-related activities did not interfere with his judicial duties."

However, the commission and the Supreme Court said Ford violated judicial codes in his appointment of NEAVS members to court duties, in his engaging "in the impermissible management of a business" and in his signing annual disclosure reports for the organization that showed he spent more hours per week working for the group than he actually did in an apparent attempt to qualify for the group's pension plan.

The court cited Ford's appointment of attorney J. Michael Roberts to 305 different probate court matters – primarily as a guardian ad litem in estate and trust cases – in which Roberts received $264,724 in fees between 1979 and 1988. Ford also hired Roberts as a staff person for NEAVS, receiving an $87,394 salary between 1981 and 1985.

In addition, the court said Ford made a total of 19 real estate commissioner appointments to settle real estate disputes to the late attorney M. Arthur Gordon, a NEAVS memner, for which Gordon and his estate received $167,321 in fees over seven years.

Altogether, "we count in the record seven lawyers . . . who were involved with both NEAVS and the Norfolk County Probate and Family Court during Judge Ford's tenure as president of NEAVS," wrote the high court, saying all violated the judicial code.

Historic companies will rebuild from ashes

By Richard Sasson
The Patriot Ledger

WESTWOOD — Dominic Marinelli of Walpole, president of the 92-year-old Norfolk Golf Club on East Street, vowed yesterday to rebuild the clubhouse that was destroyed in a $100,000, three-alarm fire over the weekend.

Marinelli said the golf course will reopen in a couple of days and the clubhouse will be rebuilt.

"It's a disappointment," he said. "The building has been there a lot of years and there's a lot of history to it. But we'll come out of it. The club will survive like it has in the past."

No members were in the club during the fire which started near the club's function room shop and a section of locker room standing, John J. Sheehy said.

Kerry calls for changes in education and savings

BOSTON (AP) — Warning that the United States faces being eclipsed by successful economic competitors, US Sen. John Kerry called yesterday for a national effort to improve education, boost the nation's savings account and unleash the country's productive energy.

"No longer can we coast and win. No longer can we make bad business decision, and bad public policy decisions, yet still win because of our vast array of advantages," Kerry said in a speech to the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce.

Kerry, who serves on the Senate Banking Committee and sits on a Democratic task force on competitiveness, argues that America is slipping behind foreign rivals because productivity has slipped and because US companies do not make the products the world wants at a competitive price.

"Productivity, of course, is a direct result of savings and investment patterns in an economy and on both counts, we have done poorly in recent years," the Massachusetts Democrat said.

In order to compete with Japan, other Pacific nations and the unified European community that will exist after 1992, Kerry called for policies that reinvest in productive enterprises, beginning with education.

Calling the public schools "a disgrace," Kerry said, "Americans simply are not being educated to compete in this new marketplace in the world."

Better schools begin with higher-paid teachers, Kerry said, proposing a tuition loan forgiveness program for teachers of math, science and engineering. The senator also called for strengthening the "school-based management" movement and for examination of a longer school year and higher minimum standards for diplomas.

In addition, Kerry said, Americans need incentives to save money that can be invested in new technologies. With a personal savings rate at the bottom of the industrial nations, the United States needs a targeted break in the capital gains tax to favor investment in start-up companies.

At the same time, Kerry said he would introduce legislation to help young families buy homes through a monthly savings program in which the government would

DID YOU KNOW....?
...Much of the sugar we eat is hidden in processed foods, e.g., 1 can of cola has 8-12 teaspoons of sugar, 1 tablespoon of ketchup has 2 teaspoons of sugar.
...Sugar has been associated with many common American diseases such as obesity, diabetes mellitus, and heart disease.
...Many foods that are high in sugar are often lacking other important nutrients including fiber, vitamins and minerals.

guarantee savers that they could afford a downpayment on a home at some specific time and price.

Kerry also called for changes in federal export policy that would make it easier for companies to see abroad. "America has to get serious about competing," Kerry said, adding that the domestic market is no longer big enough to ensure prosperity.

The Democrat said his own party was to blame because Democrats have shied away from positions that appear to support business.

Kerry declared himself a capitalist and a believer in the profit motive. He said the Republicans have done a better job at identifying themselves with economic issues, but he said the Reagan administration offered little more than rhetoric for the past eight years.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) You may be seeking information in the wrong place. Refuse to return to a restricting situation. A love relationship is glorious. Do not let a jealous individual tread on your dreams.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Your emotional responses could make someone think you are unreliable. Let him know you are doing the best you can. Curb a tendency to act on impulse. Move forward with quiet confidence.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20). Even if you feel like vanishing from the current scene, stay with it. Strong effort will let you overcome obstacles and win big. Someone in love with you wants to be more helpful.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) You know exactly when to get out of exciting but exasperating "political" situations. Use your awareness of others' needs to develop overdue improvements. Loved ones will cooperate if approached directly.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Stay in touch with your favorite people and all will go well. Try to keep things in perspective if your plans go awry. A good sense of humor stands you in good stead.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) You are completing difficult tasks and business plans that will help you move ahead. The obstacles you encounter can be overcome with persistence. Romance thrives despite confusion. Speak from the heart.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22) Write letters or telephone someone you have not seen in some time. He will understand the constraints of your busy schedule. You sense a need for intelligent guidance. Pursue spiritual growth.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov. 21) You are ready to go after what you want. Use the element of surprise. A change of scene revitalizes you. When progress is stymied, be quietly persistent. Roadblocks fall as you advance.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Your plans are excellent; stay with them. Do not be lured off-course by other tempting offers. Unexpected companions are a source of delight. Avoid controversy at social gatherings. Act circumspect and discreet.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19). An understanding with someone who means a lot to you firms your resolve. Your curious, inquiring mind could lead to a major discovery. Reach out to potential allies. Teamwork proves richly rewarding.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) You may feel less appreciated than in the past. Avoid lashing out at family members. A deep change within will bring peace of mind. Others are attracted to you. Forge new friendships.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) You feel carefree and like to joke with people. Be careful, however. A conservative person could misinterpret your lighthearted approach. Seek companions on your wavelength. Romance holds new promise.

"We're ranked fifth, which is one higher than we finished last year, but the fact of the matter is that we're 0-0," Garber said.

However, Garber also feels there could be much more parity in the nation this year. Defending champ Syracuse is ranked number one again this year, but has already suffered an early season loss to powerhouse Johns Hopkins.

"It's highly unlikely anyone in the country will go undefeated," Garber said. "It's like the Big East in basketball, but that makes it interesting."

And that puts UMass right in the thick of things this year.

"The team goals have risen. Losing to Cornell and seeing them go to the finals has reinforced what they can do," Garber said. "The guys are working harder and in their minds the goal is to make the Final Four. But we're going to play one game at a time and enjoy the season."

Gorillas to face tough schedule

Go West, young men.

That will be the opening theme of the UMass men's lax schedule, as the Gorillas travel to California for the first time.

UMass will kick off the season Sunday at UCal-Davis (not on the original schedule) and will play Cal-Berkeley (Mar. 23) and Sanoma State (Mar. 25) on the voyage to the Left Coast.

"We're venturing far away," UMass coach Dick Garber said. "They have a strong league among themselves. They're not as good as Cornell, Rutgers or Syracuse, but they're good teams. It should be a good preseason."

Speaking of those other three powerhouses, they will all be part of the Gorillas' 1989 as well. Cornell and Syracuse will be the bookends of the regular season, with Cornell being the hone opener on Mar. 29 and the Orangemen visiting on May 2 in the only game of the year at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The rest will be at the Boyden Hill.

"Cornell was in the finals the last two years, Syracuse is defending champion, and everything in between is 'Katy bar the door,'" Garber said of the schedule.

The Gorillas will also host New England foes Brown, Dartmouth and Boston College along with Rutgers, and will travel to St. John's, New Hampshire, Yale, Army and Harvard.

One interesting note is that, aside from the Western swing, all but one road game will be played on a Saturday.

"Lacrosse magazine says that UMass has a suicide schedule. Most of our games include teams in the Top 10," Garber said. Garber said no game on the schedule is the kind that can be taken lightly.

"The big games are the ones like Army, Cornell, Yale, Brown, Harvard, Rutgers and Syracuse," he said. "And the others are big for the other teams, because we will be their big game for the season."

But Garber prefers to have the tough schedule as opposed to an easy one.

"It's a tough schedule because the season is so compact, but it's exciting and one that the players and I like," he said.

More about hoop contest

The entries continue to roll in for the Collegian NCAA college hoop contest, but there isn't much time to enter.

In case you missed it in Monday's paper, or haven't been able to sniff it out somewhere else, the bracket for this year's tournament is published at right. Simply fill it out, clip it and return it with your name, local address and phone number to the Collegian office, located at 113 Campus Center.

There is a box located at the Classified window for entries. Please place them there if possible. After 3:30 p.m. you will probably have hand deliver them to someone in the newsroom.

Remember though, that all entries MUST be in by 11 a.m. tomorrow. Because the first games will begin shortly after noon, we can't have anyone trying to get even the slightest upper hand. Therefore, any entry which comes in after 11 a.m. will be promptly thrown into the trash. Plus, associate sports editor Matt Gerke will be watching the store at that time and thrives on this sort of thing. Please don't test him. Take our word for it.

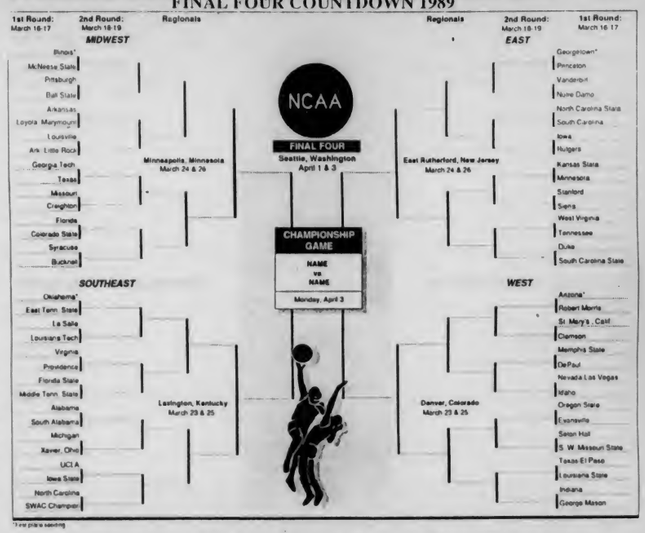
Now, many of you have already posed questions regard the tournament. First, there is the point system. The way it will be run is each round will be given points of increasing value. Any correct first round prediction is worth one point. Second round games are worth two, the regional games three and four, and the semifinals five with the championship game worth seven points.

In all, there are 192 possible points (32 per round). This is a new scoring system, revised just last night. Because it is tougher to pick the champion than a first round winner, it should have at least equal weight to someone picking every first round game correctly. This system allows for that.

Also, we will be announcing prizes sometime later this week. We're trying to dig up something worthwhile, so be patient.

People have asked if we will print our predictions. Experimenting with this two years ago, we found it nearly impossible. Instead we will regularly print our staff scores, so you can compare/laugh at us.

Editor's note: The SWAC champion at the bottom of the Southeast is Southern, just in case anyone is actually thinking of picking them over North Carolina.



All entries for this contest must be in by 11 a.m. tomorrow. There will be no exceptions.

Tomorrow: UMass baseball preview

Depth, experience mark men's lax team

All but four return from 10-3 team in '88; Gorillas show balance

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The date was May 22, 1988. It could have been a great day for the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team. But they had to sit home and watch Cornell University, a team which had eliminated them from the NCAA tournament two weeks earlier, play for the national championship against Syracuse University.

Syracuse prevailed, but it was etched in the minds of the UMass players that, had things been a little different, they could have been there.

Regardless, the day held different significance for UMass. It was also graduation day, often a doomsday for successful athletic programs. But the pomp and circumstance was kind to the Gorillas. Only four players from last year's 10-3 team picked up their diplomas on that day, leaving this year's version of Gorilla Warfare in pretty good shape.

"We basically didn't lose a lot of key players," said UMass coach Dick Garber, entering his 35th year with the team. "We have a veteran returning team, along with some new faces."

There was some talent lost. The Minutemen will need to make up the 25 goals and 14 assists scored by co-captain and attackman Kelley Carr and the strong defensive play of co-captain Glenn Stephens. Pat Cain and backup goalie Paul McCarty also departed.

But rest assured there is plenty of people ready and able to pick up the slack.

Any preseason talk about the Gorillas has to start with senior goalkeeper Sal LoCascio. The Lindenhurst, NY native is a three-time All-America, who last season registered a .667 save percentage and a 8.2 goals against average. Backing him up will be sophomore Ted Kellerman and freshman Ray Suris.

Junior midfielder Tim Soudan may be a dominating player this year for the Gorillas.

LoCascio will be fronted by an experienced backline. Seniors Tom Bonnet, Adam Rodell, Jeff Salanger all were key players in the defense last year, and Shane Kielmeyer returns after sitting out last season with a broken jaw.

Pat DeBenedictis and Eric Muench also saw action last year, and two freshmen, Richard Mullins and Corey Cronin, will also join the cast.

Garber feels one of the keys to the team's success will be how well the defensive unit supports LoCascio.

"One of our major goals is to tighten our defensive play and give up fewer shots," Garber said. "Last year, we won a lot of games but we were outshot in them. On theory if we [give up fewer shots] with great goaltending, we'll be alright."

Chances are, though, that the Gorillas could get by without a great defensive effort. Last year's team averaged 12 goals a game and promises to run the offense even more this year.

Leading the scoring barrage will be the top two returning scorers from last year, Jim McAleavey and Scott Hiller.

McAleavey, a sophomore and an honorable mention All-America last year, led the Gorillas in his first season with 20 goals and 29 assists. Hiller, a junior who gained All-America honors for the second straight year, was the team leader in goals with 28 and added 15 assists.

Also returning at attack are senior Paul Ganci (seven goals, nine assists), junior Rob Codignotto (eight goals, one assist) and sophomore Bill Begien (two goals, two assists).

"That's an experienced group there. Ganci's looked good in preseason," Garber said.

They will be joined by sophomore Tim Kesselring, a transfer from Army, and freshmen Robert Falvey and Mike Cain. The Boston Globe Player of the Year last year at Concord-Carlisle High, Cain is the third in a line of brothers who have been playing continuously for the Gorillas in recent years.

Barry Cain played from 1981-84 while Pat played from 1985 until last spring. Garber feels, however, that Mike may be the best of the lot.

The midfield may be the team's strongest position, according to Garber. Eleven players return in the midfield, typifying the experience of this year's team.

Leading the pack are seniors David Avidon, Greg Collins, Brett Jenks and Chris Tyler, followed by juniors Jamie Bergan, Marc Feinberg, John Gonzales and Tim Soudan. Garber thinks Soudan may become a real force in the country this year.

Three sophomores, Vincent D'Angelo, Rich Senatore and Josh Schimmel, also return, with freshman John Schlipf and Springfield College transfer Erich Carroll rounding out the cast.

"We have 13 people at the knee-deep position," Garber said.

Senior co-captain Chris Zusi leads the defensive middies, along with senior Kris Cuozzo. Junior college transfer Hugh O'Callahan, sophomore Jeff Suskin and freshman Mario Lopez, an Amherst native who has "been outstanding" according to Garber, will also been in the defensive midfield.

Garber feels the depth of this year's squad will be its biggest asset, with the ability to constantly shuttle experienced players in and out. With that, the Gorillas may be a more explosive unit than last year.

"We hope to maintain an up-tempo. Last year we'd sub and then have to sit back and rest a little, but with our experience and depth we can keep the attack going," Garber said, adding that games in the 18-to-20 goal range may not be out of the ordinary.

The Gorillas have benefitted from good weather this year, getting outdoors much earlier than usual and allowing them to get more actual practice time in.

This luxury has been reflected already in a pair of preseason scrimmages. On March 4, UMass traveled to Brown and beat the Bruins for the first time in many years in the preseason.

"We got outside two days before the scrimmage. Normally we'd go down there right out of the gym," Garber said.

The Gorillas also played the Brine Lacrosse Club of Boston Sunday and came away with a win. And, last fall, they picked up a 17-10 win over traditionally-tough Army, prompting the pollsters to rank UMass fifth in the nation in preseason.

Women's soccer team second at Harvard indoor tournament

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team did not stop its winning ways after the fall season was over.

This past weekend, the Minutewomen traveled to Cambridge to partake in the Harvard Invitational Indoor Tournament. UMass finished second in a field of eight teams that included five New England college teams along with a trio of amateur clubs from Massachusetts and Canada.

That team from Canada, Omega of Montreal, had never lost an indoor tournament, but UMass was able to come away with a 1-0 win in the opening game. The Minutewomen next beat Loren Atlantic, another amateur team, 3-0, and outclassed Boston College, 5-0 to advance to the championship game.

In that game, the Minutewomen faced the Black and Tan Soccer Club of Boston. What was interesting about the matchup was Black and Tan included four former UMass players.

Despite facing the likes of Debbie Belkin, Kristen Bowsher, Carla DeSantis and Michelle Powers, along with current assistant coach Lisa Gozley, UMass battled to a 0-0 tie through regulation before losing in sudden death on a penalty kick by Bowsher.

The off-season tourney gave coach Jim Rudy a chance to assess his talent for next season, and he likes what he's seen so far.

"I didn't know how we were going to be, but this is a much better start than we anticipated," Rudy said. "We played pretty ball, and we were physically tough. It was a good team effort."

Rudy cited the play of Michele Woodside, Sue Gaudette and April Kater, who each had two goals, as well as Sarah Szetela, Becky Bonzano, Margie Jaede and goalkeeper Mary Curtis.

UMass will host its own indoor tournament on April 2.

Calipari given one-year extension on contract

From Staff Reports

On the day the University of Massachusetts announced plans to host a Division I men's basketball Holiday Tournament, the University also announced that head coach John Calipari has received a one-year contract extension.

Calipari was hired last May, at a salary of $63,000, under a contract that was to last through May, 1992. The extension continues the contract through May, 1993.

He came to UMass upon the resignation of then-coach Ron Gerlufsen at the end of the 1987-88 season. Calipari had spent three years as an assistant coach at Pittsburgh, where he was the recruiting coordinator, and prior to that had spent time at the University of Kansas and University of Vermont.

UMass posted its 11th straight losing season this year, finishing with a 10-18 record.

The announcement came at a press conference Monday night at which UMass unveiled plans to host the Hall of Fame Holiday Classic for three years, beginning in 1990.

Davis and Nakajima elected

By MARIA SACCHETTI

Tracy Davis and Eric Nakajima both received landslide victories in their respective bids for Student Government Association president and student trustee.

The election was marked by the largest voter turnout in the history of SGA elections held over a one-day period, said Jason Rabinowitz, student leader.

Traditionally, SGA elections are held during two-day intervals, but changes in its constitution this semester narrowed the voting period to one day.

More than 4,000 students cast their votes Tuesday and the Davis/Nakajima United Students Agenda ticket enjoyed an overwhelming margin with Davis taking nearly 60 percent of the popular vote and Nakajima returning with 53 percent.

"I'm elated," Davis said of the landslide victory. "During the whole election, [the opposition] tried to paint me as a one-issue candidate. Clearly, the issues Eric and myself projected transcend all boundaries."

In his second bid for the SGA presidency, candidate Guy Glodis advanced one place to finish a far second with 20 percent of the vote. Glodis was followed closely by oppo-

UMass removes Theta Chi

Fraternity expelled for party that violated probation

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

As of this past Tuesday Theta Chi fraternity at the University of Massachusetts is no longer a recognized student organization because members held a party in violation of University rules, Greek area coordinator Carlene Riccelli said yesterday.

Riccelli said she met with brothers of Theta Chi and representatives from its national chapter Tuesday afternoon to inform them of the fraternity's removal.

Theta Chi, a trial run colony at UMass, was to become a chapter fraternity house.

Riccelli, speaking for herself and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson, said the fraternity, which was being punished for a previous party and violations of the school's alcohol policy, violated its probation by having a keg party on March 2. The party was reported to her by several members of the greek community, she said.

Paul Silva, president of Theta Chi, admitted upon her questioning that they had violated the probation, she said.

Phone lines at the fraternity remained busy yesterday and brothers at the house declined to comment.

Theta Chi is the third UMass fraternity in as many semesters to have been removed from the University. Last Spring Beta Kappa Phi was closed down for alcohol policy violations and two of its members faced charges of drug trafficking. A semester later, Alpha Tau Gamma was shut down for alleged hazing of pledges.

Theta Chi fraternity, as of last fall, was on administrative probation for alcohol policy violations per order of the Greek Affairs office, but was given the further punishment of social probation and a deferred suspension after a December party at which one fraternity member was injured when he fell climbing into a second-story window. The man suffered wrist and leg fractures from the fall.

University administrators said they felt compelled to add to the existing probation conditions after the accident.

The new terms of probation disallowed the fraternity from having social gatherings and, upon the next infraction of the rules, said, the fraternity would immediately be terminated as a student organization.

"I think it is unfortunate that this occurred, but they

Selectmen to vote on fees for liquor licenses

The cost of liquor licenses for area bars would double under a recent proposal to Amherst's selectboard. The board will vote on the issue April 3.

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Amherst selectmen on April 3 are scheduled to vote on a proposal to raise the liquor license fees to the maximum allowed by the state.

Under the proposal, a liquor license for wine and malt restaurants would increase from $600 to $5,000. The license for an all-alcoholic restaurant would double from $2,500 to $5,000.

A wine and malt restaurant serves only beer and wine, while an all-alcohol restauraunt may serve all forms.

The board said it will explore the issue before its April decision.

Selectman Richard Minear said businesses in Amherst could compensate for the proposed increases "by raising prices."

"The recommendations were made in light of budget constraints," said Nancy Board, the town's administrative assistant, who presented the proposal to the board on March 6. She said if the budget is passed, Amherst will lose $800,000 in state aid.

"All town boards that have fees are reviewing them to increase revenue. It's a town-wide increase," she said.

If the hike is passed, Amherst would gain $109,700 in revenue, assuming businesses renew their licenses in November, when the increases would take effect.

Board said the proposal is so drastic because "they (the license fees) haven't been reviewed or raised since 1983." The recommendation has Amherst restaurant and bar owners outraged.

"This will affect the students' pocketbooks. A beer that costs $1.50 will cost

Panel expected to recommend Cheney today

WASHINGTON (AP) — The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee said yesterday that the panel will vote Thursday on the nomination of Rep. Dick Cheney as defense secretary and said he expected unanimous support for President Bush's replacement for John Tower.

"I don't know of any opposition now," said Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., as he announced that the committee had completed its hearings on the nomination and would vote this morning.

The Georgia Democrat said he would vote for Cheney, saying he saw "no impediments" to confirmation of the nominee in an FBI background check, financial reports from the White House and Pentagon and medical records.

Nunn said the six-term Wyoming Republican congressman is "well-qualified," and called him a "man of integrity."

The second-ranking Democrat on the Armed Services panel, Sen. James Exon of Nebraska, said he saw "no problems whatsoever" to confirmation of Cheney. "I don't think there will be a vote against him," Exon said.

Liberals, Conservatives okay Davis

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The conservative and liberal factions of the undergraduate student senate broke tradition last night, coming together to ratify Tracy Davis as president of the Student Government Association.

In a surprise move, Sen. W. Greg Rothman, a conservative, and liberal Sen. Michael Greiner, campaign manager for Davis and Student Trustee-elect Eric Nakajima, motioned for the unanimous approval and immediate swearing-in of Davis, who would otherwise have taken office on April 2.

"We're all ready to work together," Rothman said, likening the lighthearted atmosphere to the traditional "honeymoon" period of initial harmony between the senate and the president experienced at the national level.

"I don't know how long it's going to last," he added, as staffers from The Minuteman gave Davis a "peace offering" bouquet of red, white, and blue carnations.

Davis received a standing ovation after she was officially sworn in by outgoing Senate Speaker Robert Fadel — his final duty in that position.

The swearing in marks the first time in more than a year that the senate has ratified a presidential candidate since filibustering by conservative senators prevented the approval of Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as SGA co-presidents.

Silkoff and Rabinowitz maintain they were legally co-presidents because of an out-of-court agreement with two student justices. The pair said they were not ratified because of concerns over the constitutionality of SGA co-presidencies and controversy over Rabinowitz's communist status.

The honeymoon period lasted barely one hour, interrupted by an attempt to remove the current freeze of the Commuter Area Government's funds, approved during last week's meeting in light of allegations of misuse of funds and President Jay Festa's resignation.

Fadel said the atmosphere quickly became hostile and said the event was "the traditional attack on the CAG because of the once-presidency of Jay Festa."

But, Sen. Brian Darling said the freeze should remain until the alleged misuse of funds is investigated.

"Partisan politics isn't going to leave the senate real soon," Darling said.

In other business:

- Sen. John Dunlap, co-president of the Northeast Area Government, was officially elected as the new Senate Speaker, replacing Robert Fadel, who said he will "watch from the floor" as a newly-elected senator from the commuter area.
- Laura Filkins was unanimously re-appointed as SGA Treasurer, beginning her second year in that position.

Budget hold-backs discussed

Provost asks deans for impact statements on 2 percent cut

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Humanities and fine arts department heads held an emergency meeting yesterday to discuss a proposed 2 percent operating budget hold-back for fiscal year 1990.

Murray Schwartz, dean of the faculty of humanities and fine arts, called the meeting because Provost Richard O'Brien has asked all of the University of Massachusetts' deans to prepare impact statements on the consequences of operating on only 98 percent of their current budgets beginning in July.

"It's not a 2 percent cut," said Schwartz. "We're being asked to reserve 2 percent of our budget. To call it a cut would be wrong."

Schwartz said the only way the humanities could operate with a 2 percent reserve would be to cancel the search for a new French department chairman and to not rehire 66 teaching assistants whose contracts are negotiated yearly.

If this happens about 5,000 course openings could not be offered for the fall semester and would hurt the University's ability to attract quality graduate students, he said.

The reason the Provost is asking for the impact statements is because the state budget for fiscal 1990 does not seem to be shaping up favorably for UMass, he said.

"All I know is there are several items under consideration [for fiscal year 1990] that we don't have funds for. [And] the money for these things has not been identified in anyone's budget," he said referring to a 53rd pay week in 1990, library funds and faculty and staff contract negotiations scheduled to be concluded this year.

Republicans cited in March 6 fight outside dorm

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

Amidst recent flak the University of Massachusetts Republican Club has been receiving from administrators and other campus groups they may have attracted more trouble in the early hours of March 6.

UMass police said they were called to the Amherst Police station at about 2:30 a.m. to assist officers there in sorting out an incident involving UMass students.

Police will not confirm any names, but five members of the club may have been involved in assaulting and harassing the publishers of a new campus paper while its first issue was being distributed.

Two of four student publishers of The Liberator, a paper "dedicated to fighting oppression," reported being confronted by enraged Republicans shortly after 2 a.m. near Van Meter Residence Hall.

Robb Smith and Edward D. Chambers said they were about to leave their vehicle to drop-off papers at the dormitory when a car came "careening" around the corner and pulled up beside them. The occupants of the car, according to the alleged victims, were Brian Darling, Doug Dratch, W. Greg Rothman, Steve Lutz and Alan Brynjolfsson.

The publishers contend the Republicans got out of their car and started to bang on the hood of the delivery vehicle and scream at its occupants goading them to come out. Smith and Chambers locked the car's doors.

"At that point we put the car in reverse and started to get out of there. Dratch tried to stop our car from leaving [by grabbing hold of the bumper] and then got into the car with the others and chased us," Chambers said.

The chase, Chambers said, ended at Amherst Police station, where the Republicans emerged from their vehicle and started harassing them again. Chambers said he then leaned on the car horn to draw police out of the station.

After about three minutes the police did come out, but the Republicans had left the scene, Chambers said.

Amherst Police recorded the incident as happening on Boltwood Avenue and took statements from Chambers and Smith.

Chambers and Smith said they filed assault charges in Northampton District Court the same morning. Charges may have been filed but that information will not be disclosed until a decision has been made to hold a hearing, a court clerk said March 7.

Eileen Stewart, assistant Dean of Students, said yesterday that both alleged victims approached her the day after the incident to "Explore the possibilty of taking out charges under the Code of Student Conduct against the Republicans."

"I am concerned in general that the level of political discourse has reached the point of fisticuffs. I'm extremely concerned," Stewart said.

Steve Lutz, a member of the Republican Club, did not deny encountering the paper's staffers, but gave a different account of the events which transpired early that morning.

Lutz said he and the other four Republicans, irate over the paper's allegedly derogatory articles about them, came upon the paper's distributors at Van Meter wanting to discuss the possibility of not distributing the issue.

He said the distributors tried to leave in their car and almost ran down his colleague, Doug Dratch, in the process. Then the Republicans followed the two to the Club privileges under review

Suspension of meeting room and equipment privileges for two University of Massachusetts student groups will continue until the end of the semester under recommendations from Eileen Stewart, assistant Dean of Students at the school.

Stewart's decision, the result of an investigation into a brawl between members of the UMass Republican Club and some guests of the Friends of the Spartacus League, upholds an earlier decision to rescind the group's privileges made in late February.

Recommendations made in the report will be sent to Dudley Bridges, director of Building Services who initially took away both groups privileges, and Irene Carew, director of student activities, for immediate review and evaluation.

The report outlines the events which transpired on the evening of Feb. 9 in a Campus Center meeting room where the Friends of the Spartacus League's parent organization — the Spartacist League — were conducting a video presentation/question and answer forum.

Stewart's report, finished yesterday, concluded from interviews with eyewitnesses and police, that blame for the nearly 25-person wrestling match, which erupted during the discussion portion of the meeting, could not decisively be placed on either group.

Police said they averted a second confrontation between the two groups one week later when members of both spotted each other in the Student Union and exchanged harsh words.

The report quotes an "uninvolved witness" from the latter confrontation who said it looked as if both groups were creating a situation "in which to blame the other."

Sham candidate Tom Darling took nearly five percent of the overall total while Morgan Hugo and Cynthia Evans finished with a tie of 50 votes apiece.

Nakajima enjoyed a healthy lead over Bob Monaghan, who finished second with 21 percent of the popular vote. Sandy Edwards remained in third place for the second year in a row, but her earned vote percentage dropped to 13 percent from more than 17 percent last year.

Trustee candidate Al Arpad eased by Rob Skelton with six percent of the vote and Rich Barry finished last with two percent.

The referendum question asking for the continued existence of MassPIRG, which combats toxic waste and pollution, passed overwhelmingly. Students also defeated a proposal to put a positive check-off on tuition bills to help subsidize the organization.

Davis said this year's campaign was "nastier" than last year's election of Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as SGA co-presidents, which has never been approved by the senate.

"That goes back to the partisan views in the senate," she said, adding that she does not anticipate similar problems with her own ratification.

Davis said the first course she will take as president is to address issues of campus safety and has already established contact with Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson.

Senate ratification of Davis' presidency, which is necessary for her to take office, is slated to occur in two weeks. Nakajima will take office in July.

$2.50," if the recommendation is passed, said Chick Delano, owner of Delano's in downtown Amherst. Delano's is an all-alcoholic restaurant.

"Amherst will have the highest fees in western Massachusetts and probably the second highest behind North Andover," he said.

Jerry Beals, assistant manager of Barselotti's, said the increase is "$2,500 we can't afford to give away. It's too harsh to ask for a 100 percent increase."

He said he is not sure how the increase will affect prices because bars in town are involved in a "price war." Steve Slezek, owner of Taco Villa, has a wine and malt restaurant. He said "The increase is outrageous. There has to be a middle point instead of raising the license [733] percent, to the maximum. I have to raise prices to reflect the cost of license, I have no choice."

"I have to do something," Slezek said. "I will probably raise the price of beer 80 cents across the board," he said.

"Town is having a problem making the budget work. There are more avenues to look into, and I don't think they have," Slezek said.

Several bar and restaurant owners say they plan to appear before selectmen early next month to voice their opposition to the proposal.

Amherst Police station and again tried to talk with the distributors, Lutz said.

The Republicans gave up and left before the police came out, Lutz said. They never came into any physical contact with Chambers or Smith and called the threatened assault charges ridiculous, he said.

This latest incident is the second one involving assault charges against members of the UMass Republican Club in the past month.

The Republicans are now entangled in a legal battle with the Spartacus League, a Cambridge-based Trotskyist organization with whom they brawled during a forum in the Campus Center Feb. 9.

Both groups have filed assault charges against each other, but a court date has not been determined and the case is continued indefinitely.

The Republicans have been dealing some legal blows of their own by threatening to file suit against administrators for suspending the group's privileges after the fight with the Spartacus League.

Administrators have taken away meeting room and equipment privileges from the Republicans and the Friends of the Spartacus League, the student organization which hosted its parent organization on the night of the fight, until the issue has been investigated.

Shelters aid battered women

Coalition provides peer support and legal advocacy for women

By ALETHEA O'DONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

Every 15 seconds a woman in the United States is physically abused.

Every 15 days a woman in Massachusetts is murdered by her husband or boyfriend.

In the wake of these statistics, battered women's shelters in the state work together to fight violence against women, and aid the battered and their children.

Five shelters in western Massachusetts belong to the Massachusetts Coalition of Battered Women's Service Groups, said Sue Dizek, a coordinator of Womanshelter, a battered women's shelter in Holyoke.

The coalition provides services for some battered women. The shelters provide a place to stay, as well as peer support and legal advocacy, she said.

"Our purpose is to empower [battered women] because they don't need another disempowering figure," Dizek said. "We'll give her information and options, but we don't tell her what to do."

The Boston-based coalition, which provided the statistics, is a central referral agency for state shelters. In 1987, 2,370 women and 3,126 children stayed in the shelters, according to the agency. Another 8,600 women received services such as economic counseling and legal advocacy.

Gail Keilson, service coordinator of Necessities/Necesidades in Northampton, said the shelter for which she works turns away a "tremendous" number of women because of its small budget. Keilson said she tries to refer women to other Massachusetts shelters.

Necessities/Necesidades houses only three women and their children.

Dizek said for abused women, "a shelter is the bottom line." Once a woman is sheltered, she is usually able to get out of the abusive situation, she said.

But Pam Brown, a director of the New England Learning Center for Women in Transition, in Greenfield, said a cycle of violence makes it difficult for battered women to leave their situations.

"The cycle begins with a battering incident. After this the batterer feels contrite, and he will be loving for a time, buying her flowers," she said. "Then, she sees signs that things aren't going right, there is tension, and she tries to please him. Soon another incident takes place."

Brown said many women do not recognize the cycle until it is pointed out to them. The best time to work with a battered woman is directly after an abusive incident has occurred, because "then we can make her recognize the cycle," she said.

Dizek said battered women stay in an abusive situation for many reasons. "First of all, she stays because of fear. Fear of her abuser, fear of the unknown, of how her family will react. Also, she is isolated. She is afraid of losing her children. She has emotional ties -- she loves him and thinks she can hold the marriage together and work it out. She's embarrassed and tries to keep it hidden."

Sometimes a woman leaves the batterer because he hurts her children, Dizek said. Although it is rare for a man who abuses his wife to also abuse his children, she said, the children may get hurt trying to intervene.

Women often leave when a child models the father's behavior, she said. "They see disrespect and they hear daddy calling mommy stupid. When a woman sees this, often she knows that she doesn't want this to happen and she will finally leave."

Dizek said about two-thirds of the battered women who are aided by area shelters eventually lead "violence-free" lives.

Keilson said even if a battered woman returns to the abusive situation, the support received from a shelter may help her gain the emotional strength needed to leave her abuser permanently.

Wishing for winter clothing camouflage

Bikinis are staked on dormitory doors, a harbinger of doom displayed next to them: 6 days 'til Spring Break '89. The temperature is crawling out of the teens. Cadbury Cream eggs are back in season. A lone, chirping bird wakes me up at 7 a.m. as I realize I can't find my waist or toes.

Alise Harfield

It's high time for yet another rite of spring — the diet. Don't assume I'm unhappy. I am well used to this by now, having discovered a love-hate relationship with old man winter — his holidays (Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year) increase our natural and even necessary cravings for anything remotely resembling food. His lousy weather packs us inside dorms and DC's where eating is a mode of warmth and survival; yet he provides us with endless knit excuses for warmth (a.k.a. camouflage) like bulky wooly sweaters, down jackets, Champion sweats, earmuffs, hoods, mittens and facemasks in which to seal cellulite.

I hated facts years ago. Winter has a way of fattening those who love food.

I've never saw the purpose of fighting with a recurring element. Winter was around before I was born, and will linger on long after I'm gone. Fighting the enemy as it is upon you is ludicrous. So my flab and I procrastinate, ignoring the enemy until it wears itself out and departs, leaving me to reconstruct the body during the aftermath of spring. This year has been the worst.

I thought starting early (late February) would put me ahead of the gang, allow me to bare arms in short-sleeves before August. So I ventured to Totman gymnasium, where exercise combined with caloric cuts would be my definitive answer in '89.

I walked earnestly inside, each step further convincing myself that I, too, could wear shorts next week in Florida had I the opportunity. I heard those lovely sounds of basketballs bouncing on parquet floors, whistles blowing in unsuspecting eardrums and people cursing at one another in what I pictured as the epitome of health — aerobic activity. I couldn't wait to have to wipe sweat, not soup, from my face.

Then I chanced upon the sign that would change this year's dieting effort — "The Body Shop, now open." With images of an auto mechanic transforming a junk yard heap of metal into a sparkling sports car just in time for spring driving, I sprinted.

I was relieved to find the Body Shop tucked neatly away in the basement of Totman where no one could catch me in my sweaty efforts. I saw shiny silver nautilus machines, clear mirrors, and comfortable carpets under it all. I heard some of my favorite songs and envisioned myself leading an exercise class one day.

Then I entered.

I was dumbfounded at one fell swoop. Men with tight muscles were 'benching' with weights the size of my dorm, some were sit upping at food processor speeds, others were stretching their triple joints into contortions. That wonderful music seemed to turn into a rendition of Sesame Street's One of these things is not like the others. Mine was the only rotund body in the place!

Out of this twilight zone, a figure in a body suit approached me with a clip board. I hoped she didn't want to photograph me for a 'before' picture. As she spoke to me I thought of sitcoms where the mother makes the kids straighten the house before the cleaning lady's visit. I should have lost forty plus pounds before journeying here. I looked around and wondered why these people were exercising, then remembered that maintenance is the necessary part of improvements — for human bodies or cars. It had been a long while since I reached that point of dieting.

It will be a long time this year, too. I feigned an interest in joining, then walked gloomily home. My next occasion in spandex would be after I lose weight this season. Maybe by finals.

Until then, I want to transfer to U. Alaska. I hear it's still winter over there.

The dating game — UMass style

Contemporary young men and women are undergoing a crisis. Many of them are at times experiencing slight forms of schizophrenia.

Being a student at the University of Massachusetts, I see this happen all the time. UMass is a school of enormous size, and it is often difficult to meet someone who is intriguing or interesting to you.

Minu Sebastian

Ever see someone at a party who you'd like to meet? So, why can't you just go up to this person, introduce yourself, and maybe ask if you could go out sometime?

Well, unless you want beer spit all over you from the person laughing so hard, you'll probably not take so direct an approach.

Instead, you decide to take a slower plan of action. First, you try to establish some sort of eye contact, but as soon as he looks back at you, you immediately look in the opposite direction. Wondering what your next step should be, you decide to ask your friends for their opinion. Big mistake.

All of your friends crowd around you and start looking around for him. After much pointing and whispering, they finally catch sight of him. He looks in your direction wondering what all the commotion is about.

You now feel totally humiliated, but you force yourself to say "hi," (you don't want to seem like a fool). You carry a casual conversation, but then leave him to be with your friends, because after all, you don't want him to think you're aggressive or desperate.

You act really cool by talking to your friends and acting like you're having a great time. Always keeping sight of where he is, you occassionally glance in his direction.

You spend the next half hour actively ignoring this person. After a while, you decide to walk past him to see if he will say anything to your when you walk by. As you're walking by, you make it a point not to look at him and act as though you're looking around for someone else. He says "hi," but you act indifferent, and continue your "search."

Eventually, he leaves and you're left with this sad and empty feeling. You wonder: why didn't he ask me out?

Personally, I think this guy must have some kind of mental disability if he didn't get the message that you were interested in him. Judging by your personality, your feelings should have been obvious. You were friendly, aloof, sociable, withdrawn, talkative, and quiet. Your personality had such diverse qualities that there is no way he could not be intrigued by you.

Maybe next time you should try a more direct approach. Walk up to him, "accidentally" spill beer on him, and then offer to wash his shirt. And if that doesn't work, tell him to go see a psycho therapist because he definitely has a communication problem.

Keeping the streets safe from illegally parked cars

"Serving and protecting, with courtesy, 24 hours a day."
- UMass Police Department motto.

12:30 a.m., Friday. Three suspicious characters are spotted snooping around the quiet Orchard Hill suburbs. I am one of those prowlers. To protect their identities, I'll refer to my cohorts as "Karen" and "Gretchen."

The evening started innocently enough, sipping soft drinks and reminiscing about old times. None of us had any intention of breaking the law. It just happened.

Our conversation creeped into the early morning, prompting hints that transportation back to my dorm was available. Taking advantage of Karen's shuttle service, I requested to be dropped off at a driveway behind my dorm.

Karen stopped her car at the drop-off site, allowing time for me to gather my belongings. Little did I know that our every move was being monitored. Stepping out the door, I was blinded by a flashing blue strobe light. High beams illuminated the entire region, leaving no place to hide. I was caught red-handed with a box of cereal and some orange juice.

Eager to prove that my shredded wheat wasn't laced with cocaine, I casually approached the police car. The peace-seeking mission was met with hostility. Maybe my orange juice carton was mistaken for a dangerous weapon, because the police officer addressed me in a tone usually reserved for convicted criminals.

"STOP RIGHT WHERE YOU ARE. GO BACK TO THE CAR AND WAIT FOR ME THERE!" she boomed. By now my curiosity climaxed. Have I unknowingly murdered someone? Are Karen and Gretchen involved in some elaborate prostitution ring? Why were we being stalked down by a police cruiser?

Darren Garnick

But now was no time to philosophize. I was about to make my debut in a new section of the Collegian — the police log.

Let the harassment games begin! First the officer questioned my audacity to approach the police car, citing a violation of state law. I explained that as a law-abiding citizen, I had little experience in being pulled over by police and was unaware of the correct protocol. Although I said this without the slightest trace of a smirk, she warned me not to be a smart-aleck, or Karen would be slapped with a $25 fine. Yes, the driver of the car would be penalized for her passenger's sarcasm.

After I convinced the officer that I was not seeking a showdown, she got tired of me and decided to intimidate someone else. Pulling a flashlight out of her utility belt, she panned the back seat for illicit drugs. Coming up empty, she ran Karen's social security number through the computer, hoping to discover a criminal past.

It took 15 minutes of questioning and computer tests for the UMass officer to conclude the obvious — we weren't criminals. However, the driveway we were on was technically a sidewalk.

Since we were unaware of this, she waived the $25 fine.

At 12:30 a.m., enforcing obscure parking violations has priority over rape and vandalism. Two people dropping off a friend is seen as a threat to the community.

Compared to the back alleys of Boston, patrolling UMass is like girl scout camp. Oh, there are a few cookie crumbs in the bed sheets, but covert weapon smuggling operations are a rarity. When something "exciting" does happen, the UMass police force tends to overreact. Underage drinkers and disobedient car owners are scum and should be treated accordingly.

When I hear the word "police," images of pigs and riot gear don't immediately surface. I still think of the officer who helps a lost child find his or her parents at the shopping mall. But I instantly link one thought to the phrase "UMass police."

Harrassment.

The proper name is Cutback City

As a resident of Cutback City, I sincerely appreciate the support and participation of the campus community in our efforts.

However, I would like to answer a recent letter in the Collegian ("UMass far from Shanty Town," March 13) by Amy Sandridge, that we refer to our home as "Cutback City," not as "Shanty Town." We refer to our houses as "shacks" or even "Freestyle Sheds," but not as "shanties."

The Collegian can and does name our dwelling in its own words and often without our input, therefore we claim no responsibility for the words it sees fit to print. We do, however, appreciate the coverage that the Collegian has given us. Any exposure is a help.

Association with a form of protest directed against apartheid is not something I consider to be bad. However, our protest is not on South Africa; instead, we are concerned with a national problem.

I'd also like to point out that there is not monopoly on shanty towns held by South Africa. Poor people throughout the world live in this type of dwelling. In Jamaica, South America, Mexico, and even here in the United States there are people who find themselves without means to provide better housing for themselves and their families.

Holyoke students stereotyped

An article appeared in the Collegian which embarrasses me and threatens the reputation of every Mount Holyoke College student ("The View from the Mount and the Five College Scene," March 6) written by Kristina Denuis.

The article presents what Denius calls "interesting attitudes toward neighboring colleges and their make-up of students," but what it does is imply false generalizations about Mount Holyoke students. Though Denius notes that the opinions in her article are those of only one group of students, she fails to present the predominant opinions on our campus. The result is an embarrassment to Denius and her classmates.

I hope that those who read Denius' article realize that it doesn't represent the views of most Mount Holyoke students. In fact, it contradicts some of the values we take great pride in. Despite the views of Denius' friends and dorm members, the rest of us try to be open-minded. We encourage the belief that it is wrong to judge people on the basis of race, sex, income, manner of dress, or physical appearance.

My apologies to any student who has been a victim of the stereotypes presented in this article. You were judged unfairly.

Denius admits that "stereotypes are generally considered injurious to the fabric of moral society," and explains that "it's often difficult to avoid classifying people under a blanket category when your sole basis for judgement is the people and/or the institution only contributes to the problem we should all be working to eliminate."

In the mean time, I think Denius owes her classmates an apology for the way we were presented to our community.

Unpopular opinions unfairly labeled

Undoubtedly, some will find this equation to be without merit, yet that is exactly what some of us strongly feel, and this is what Roger Libby felt when he attended the recent protest outside the Amherst Newsroom.

Although our position on pornography and implications relating to women may differ somewhat from that of Roger, we strongly support his addressing the issue of censorship at the protest rally.

It is with this backdrop that we are sharing our concern about two very related aspects of the past protest. One has to do with Helen Harrison's column ("Playboy protesters fall prey to ignorant hecklers", March 6), in which she trivialized Roger Libby's attendance. We found it interesting that there are some who must always condemn sound but unpopular positions whenever they disturb their own. While Helen Harrison found "the heckling was constant and unoriginal" from some of the males at the males at the protest. It wasn't just men who were heckling; some women shouted at Roger Libby that they would "cut his d—k off."

Our second concern is related to what was shouted at Roger. Someone spray painted on the garage side of Roger's house "Cut it off." This elevates the issue to another form of censorship: "Sit down, you're a sexist, and you're rocking the boat, Roger!" We are distressed by the violence of this of action: why can't people disagree without hating those who hold opposing opinion?

Finally, to Helen Harrison's comment about Roger Libby's "horny toad," we agree that it is the people whose hearts have been hardened by certainty who find it most difficult to let loose and guffaw. They are unwilling to challenge their own convictions, and they detest anyone who pokes fun at their beliefs.

We should be ever be mindful of the importance of humor as a self-corrective method of keeping us from becoming stern absolutists. Or, in the stirring words of Henry "Shecky" Bergson: "Take my dogma please!" We must find a peaceful, understanding manner in which to exchange our views on controversial subjects with people who hold different opinions. We should learn to accept that someone who doesn't agree with us may still be a friendly, caring human being — they just disagree.

Totman fight falsely called racist

I would like to address and editorial by K. Andrew Mitchell ("Public Safety leaves Black students open to harm," March 13).

Mitchell referred to a Collegian article on a fight near Totman gym between a Black man and a White man. I am infuriated by the falsehoods contained in Mitchell's article and appalled that they were allowed to be presented as fact in his editorial. The fight was not a "vicious racial attack" as Mitchell infers. It was not racially motivated as the Collegian suggested. And Mitchell is wrong when he claims that "no one knows what happened that week in February." I know. I was there.

The fight was not motivated by the color of the Black man's skin, but rather by his completely obnoxious behavior. The Collegian report was horribly inaccurate in that it told only one side of the incident.

I applaud the efforts of the University to combat the problem of racism on our campus. But I condemn the Collegian for misrepresenting facts to the campus community. The reason the Collegian did not elaborate on the alleged racism of this incident is because it had no facts to support the false comments of a spectator.

Feminists don't have to be female

Not all men are sexist pigs who wave Playboy centerfolds in the faces of anti-pornography demonstrators yelling "You're just jealous because you're too ugly to be in here," and "The hell they're not," in response to protester's chant "Women are not playthings!"

Last semester, an anti-pornography workshop was organized through the Educator/Advocate Program of the Everywoman's Center. The film Not a Love Story, a documentary exposing the pornography industry as promoter of the degradation and mutilation of women, was shown as a part of this. This attracted roughly sixty people, about half of whom were men. I was especially excited by the fact that these men actively participated in the workshop discussion before and after the film.

International Women's Day was celebrated in the Cape Cod Lounge and had a big turn out of both men and women. The entire UMass men's lightweight crew team showed their support by making buttons which read, "UMass Lightweight Crew Supports International Women's Day." Who would have thought that these men thought of anything besides rowing? Well they do, and they are certainly not alone in their support of women's rights.

The women Studies Brown Bag Series, which are weekly lectures by guest speakers on issues and experiences concerning women, has drawn a great crowd at each meeting. Again, thought women still dominate in number, a fair amount are men. In fact, on March 29, Michael Wolff, a professor in the English department here at the University of Massachusetts, will be lecturing at the Brown Bag on "Men as Feminists."

As protests and marches continue in the fight for women's rights, more and more men are speaking out along with women. Yet can men really be feminists, as they are the oppressors whom we are fighting against? I say yes, they can. Their participation in our fight for rights is very encouraging and extremely appreciated — keep it up! And hopefully those men who still have delusions of superiority will become the minority.

TV's sin-and-sex parade marches on. Highlights on last week's tabloid shows ranged from a story on "the undercover Romeo," a drug informant who allegedly lured innocent women into dope deals, to an ogling visit to a topless coffee shop. Can't something be done, critics and concerned viewers cry, about such tasteless shows? Now a campaign against sleaze appears to be gathering steam. But the cure may be worse than the disease.

The issue leaped to the fore two weeks ago, when a Michigan housewife, Terry Rakolta, became an instant celebrity for her successful letter-writing campaign against the bawdy Fox network sitcom Married. . . With Children. Responding to her complaints, several major advertisers, including Kimberly-Clark and Procter & Gamble, said they would no longer run ads on the show because of its "offensive" content. The sitcom — Fox's highest rated show — is in no mortal danger: ad time is sold out for the season, Fox officials say, and only one company, Tambrands, actually cancelled a scheduled commercial because of Rakolta's complaints.

Her one-woman ground swell, however, has exposed a growing skittishness among advertisers. While many are "tonnage" buyers, willing to place their commercials anywhere, others carefully select shows in order to avoid being associated with questionable material. With the proliferation of so-called trash TV, the number of troublesome programs has multiplied. Among them are such tabloid shows as A Current Affair, Inside Edition, and The Reporters; sensational talk programs like The Morton Downey Jr. Show and Geraldo; and occasional over-the edge network offerings like Geraldo Rivera's NBC special last fall on Satanism.

Administration proposes child-care legislation

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Bush administration yesterday unveiled long-promised legislation setting up a system of tax credits to help low-income parents make child-care arrangements.

President Bush's proposal, outlined by Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater after Bush briefed several members of Congress in the Cabinet Room, would provide a tax credit of up to $1,000 for each child under age 4 in low-income working families. He said 2.5 million American families would initially benefit from the legislation.

"Families would be free to choose the kind of child care that best suits their needs," Fitzwater told reporters during the daily news briefing.

Bush pledged during his presidential campaign that he would seek to assist low-income families, in which at least one parent works, by using the tax code to help defray the cost of child-care.

The legislation was being introduced on Capitol Hill by Senate Republican leader Bob Dole of Kansas.

"This offers federal assistance for parents that might want to use relatives for child care," Fitzwater said.

Under the bill Bush seeks, which will have to compete with Democratic-sponsored legislation, the tax credit would be provided to families with incomes ranging from $8,000 to $13,000 a year in the 1990 tax year.

For each child under the age of 4, families would receive a credit equal to 14 percent of wages, with a maximum credit equal to $1,000 per child.

The major Democratic bill is the $2.5 billion Act for Better Child Care Services. Most of the money would be for direct assistance to supply and set up an insurance risk pool. States would have to comply with minimum health and safety standards about five years after enactment.

Sen. Rudy Boschwitz, R-Minn., talking to reporters in the White House driveway following the meeting with Bush, said he thought the president was moving "in the right direction."

Under existing law, parents are allowed a $720 credit for shild care costs incurred in order to accept or keep employment, but it applies only to families with sufficient income to pay federal income taxes.

Soundgarden hits heavy, falls hard at Hampshire

By JASON TALERMAN
Collegian Staff

I have an old, dear friend who believes that all great men should name themselves. Thus, his nomen, "the gypsy trigger". While I was dredging it out watching Soundgarden at Hampshire he was curled up in Hartford, with his elderly, much scarred, grandmother reading up on the Holocaust. This is all the proof you need. He is far greater than I for I was on assignment, without leave, at the show sucking up some of the most overrated hard rock of recent times. One could argue that I am the better man as all he had in front of him were several volumes on the annals of human misery while I was being exposed to the freedom of expression that only pure Marshall tube power can create.

It should be noted, however, that "the Gypsy Trigger" was picked up later in the evening in nearby Vernon on weapons charges. My late night was no better. The bass player from the area's most misreable band grabbed hold of the side of my head and told me that I should be more succinct in my synopses of local talent. I feel that I can pack more quality in my self styled digression format than with more conventional methodology but I will try to comply.

Last year Rolling Stone hailed Soul Asylum as the great new hope. This year it is Soundgarden. Last month's issue put them at the top of the heap in terms of college airplay oriented bands. The very fact that they have regurgitated everything that Mark Arm has done for Green River and Mud Honey has made me a little skeptical. Lately, though, they have jumped slightly to the metal end of the spectrum. I think this is fine move on their part. They've added a lot of originality while prodding the major labels to sniff around. I'm sure that their recent signing with A*M looked pretty good with Jan Wenner and the rest of the boys at Rolling Stone.

SOUNDGARDEN blasting away at Hampshire College last Sunday.

They've approached metal with their recent SST album, Ultramega ok, and their tune on Sub Pup 200 solidified this stance but I heard none of it Sunday night at Hampshire. They played strictly like you would expect a Green River prodigy to play. Don't get me wrong, that type of sound is one that I've become very close to in recent months but Soungarden just does not have the same songwriting that Mark Arm provides for his various projects. The discrepancy is one of style, not content. I felt the same way about the opening act, Sylvia Juncosa. She is one talented mofo but the songs seemed to lack those little nooks and crannies that I crave. Maybe I have been poisoned by AM radio but a tune has just gotta have a little bit of hit potential in order to give me that warm feeling that I usually reserve for quality physical contact.

I have to bus down to Hartford, otherwise I'd go on. It's kind of an emergency, if "the Gypsy Trigger" doesn't make bail by morning they'll put him in the release program for sure.

LYLE LOVETT plays at Smith College tonight.

Lyle style: schizo country

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

You might be forgiven for thinking, as you drop the needle (or laser beam if you're upwardly mobile) on side one of Lyle Lovett and his Large Band, that you've mistakenly been given an old Benny Goodman LP (which would be no bad thing in itself.) Whatever you do, DO NOT take it back and demand a refund, or you'll miss one of the best records of the year so far, an album which is truly schizophrenic in the nicest possible way, split right down the middle between big band swing sophistication and the plaintive beauty of country, a slab of vinyl which will make you laugh and then "laugh on the other side of your face", as my mom used to say. So who is the guy in the lounge suit with the Eraserhead hairdo?

Lyle Lovett, like fellow Texan singer/songwriter Nanci Griffith, began performing in the late 70's in small music clubs around Texas, before moving on to play other parts of the states in 1983. He went on to Europe where he met a band from Phoenix, with whom he demoed the first ever "band" versions of his songs. It was this tape which led to a contract with MCA and his self-titled debut album.

Along with the likes of Griffith, Steve Earle and Dwight Yokam Lovett has been tagged "New Country," by label obsessives like Rolling Stone, but he is determined to elude such commodity pigeonholing. His albums, Lyle Lovett and Pontiac are both works of individual genius in themselves, combining styles ranging from blues ("M.O.N.E.Y," "She's No Lady (She's my Wife)") to gorgeous country ballads ("Walk Through the Bottomlands," "If I was The Man You Wanted").

He is also one of the best lyricists around today (check out the dazzlingly sassy wordplay in "What Do You Do," or the poetic simplicity of "If You Were To Wake Up," where Lovett laments on a lost love, "Time reaches to you/ just like a willow/ that bends to the water/ and clings to the shore."

A couple of years ago, I was fortunate enough to see Lyle Lovett at the Mean Fiddler acoustic room, accompanied only by his cellist John Hagen, mesmerising the audience with devastating songs like "God Will," about a man's inability to forgive his wife's infidelity; "God will but I won't/ And that's the difference between God and me."

Now he's on the road again, with the full "Large Band" in tow, and tonight you have the chance to discover the man's unique talent for yourself, when he plays John M. Greene Hall at Smith College. Doors open 6:15 p.m., show at 7. Tickets and info. from the Iron Horse Cafe. You'd be a waltzing fool to miss him.

Two out of three ain't bad for N.Y. Stories

New York Stories
Hampshire Six Theaters

The "omnibus" movie has a long and inglorious history. I mean you've only got to look at such "classics" as Twilight Zone: The Movie or Movie Movie to realise that sticking some big name directors together does not a masterpiece make, and to my mind is more a sign of a lack of decent full-length scripts than anything else. But New York Stories is different (or at least, two thirds of it is), in that it recognises the art of the "short," as beign something akin to the art of the short story, hence the name.

FILM REVIEW

The first of these, Martin Scorsese's "Life Lessons" shows the master of camera balletics at the height of his powers. Nick Nolte plays a Soho artist who harbors an obsessive love for his assistant, played by Rosanna Arquette, a love which he exorcizes through his painting. But in reality he idealises himself as much as he does her.

Scorsese knows something about the obsessive power of images. In one breathtaking sequence he films Arquette in a dazzling blue light, and turns her into a Petrarchan Goddess. It's no coincidence either, that Arquette's elevated room, below which the Herculean Nolte stands in worship, alludes to Juliet's window.

Nolte and Arquette are both excellent in the central roles, and Scorsese brilliantly juxtaposes the glitzy, shallow New York art scene with the intense, suffocating interiors of Nolte's studio, where he blasts Pavarotti, Procul Harum and Cream to fuel the fire of his obsession.

Now at this point you should step out of the Theater and have a stroll or read a book, or maybe check out one of the other movies playing, for future reference, because next up is Copolla's "Life Without Zoe" which is so cloying it made me feel physically nauseous.

It's the tale of a bunch of spoiled brats, one of whom, Zoe, helps to perpetuate the decadent lifestyle of a decaying aristocracy, while at the same time trivializing the all-too-real plight of New York's homeless population.

Life Without Zoe not only celebrates capitalism, it embraces feudalism. I found it about as charming and endearing as a lump of cold sick. And you've got to remember, this was made by the same guy who did both Godfather movies, which stand together as perhaps the greatest cinematic dissection of the capitalist disease in America since Citizen Kane.

For the movie as a whole, I would say that life without Zoe would be a very desirable state of affairs.

Ok, you can return to your seat now. It's time for Woody Allen's Oedipus Wrecks which is really just an extended Jewish mother, but in the hands of Woody, a killingly funny one. The plot mixes fantasy and reality in the way of Allen's best short stories, with the Allen character facing literally cosmic embarrassment from his nightmarish mother (a brilliant performance from Mae "Betty Boop" Questel).

For my money the thematic connection betwee the segments of New York Stories is too tenuous to give the movie a sense of artistic wholeness, and this feeling can only be heightened by the awfulness of Coppola's contribution. Perhaps things would have been different if it had been, say, Brian De Palma or Sidney Lumet who had taken the middle segment, but I don't know. As far as this omnibus is concerned, I think two decks is quite enough.

Bill would let others testify for child abuse victims

BOSTON (AP) — Saying child molesters are walking free because their victims fear to testify against them in open court, Essex County District Attorney Kevin burke on Wednesday urged passage of legislation that would allow others to testify for the children.

Burke's bill, backed by several legislators and drafted with the help of the attorney general's office, the Department of Social Services and other district attorneys, represents "a plea from every prosecutor" in the commonwealth, Burke said.

"There are thousands of cases of child sexual abuse, rapes of children, every year in the commonwealth of Massachusetts," he said.

"And under current Massachusetts law, the most accurate and complete statement of sexual abuse of a child victim is often not available for consideration by a judge and jury.

"Consequently, in hundreds of cases, sexual abuse of children goes undetected (and) sexual abusers go unprosecuted or underprosecuted," he told a Statehouse news conference.

Burke's measure would provide an exception to the rules of evidence in civil and criminal trials involving sexual abuse of children under the age of 10.

The bill would allow teachers, social workers, police or others to testify about statements the children made to them outside the courtroom when the child can't or won't reveal as much in court and there is medical evidence to corroborate the testimony.

Under general court rules, judges and juries can only consider evidence spoken by a witness from the witness stand, but exceptions to the so-called hearsay rules have been allowed when others testify on the out-of-court statements of the witness that point to the person's state of mind or are contrary to the witness' interests.

Burke said the exception for sexually abused children is needed because these young witnesses often refuse to divulge as much in open court as they would outside court, particularly when they are having to testify in the presence of an accused parent.

A young mother attending the news conference told how her son, allegedly raped by his father at the age of 3, "coiled up into a fetal position on my lap, buried his face in my hand and just started to cry 'Mommy, Mommy,' when called to testify.

The boy was removed from the courtroom and the trial proceeded without his testimony, she said.

"They tried to use my statement," she said. The prosecutors had medical evidence.

WATER SHOVEL — Six-year-old Kevin O'Heir slings water in front of his house on Morrill Ave., in Waterville, Maine yesterday as warmer temperatures turned snowpiles to liquid fun. With spring less than a week away many puddles and potholes were visible.

Gay judge confirmed

BOSTON (AP) — With Gov. Michael S. Dukakis presiding, the Executive Council voted yesterday to confirm the nomination of the state's first openly gay judge - Dermot Meagher of Boston, who will sit in the Boston Municipal Court.

Meagher, who was not present for the vote, was confirmed by an 8-to-1 margin, with Councilor John F. Markey of North Andover casting the only dissenting vote. Meagher will succeed Judge Joseph Feeney, who retired last year.

"I'm pleased," Dukakis, who nominated Meagher on the advice of the Judicial Nominating Council, said afterward.

Dukakis administration sources said the governor had received anti-homosexual letters and telephone calls since the nomination became widely known last week, and several councilors said they had fielded hostile calls.

"These things happen," Dukakis said, shrugging off the opposition to Meagher, who was praised by a parade of witnesses last week.

Meagher, a Boston resident who serves on the state Board of bar Overseers, openly acknowledged in an interview with the Executive Council that he was a homosexual and that he had a drinking problem more than a decade ago.

Councilor Rosemary Tierney of New Bedford said she had agonized over the nomination more than any other issue except prisoner commutations.

"I had a number of constituents call and say anyone who is openly gay does not belong on the bench," she said, along with calls urging her to oppose Meagher because of his alcoholism.

"I found myself bending over backwards to give him the benefit of the doubt," Tierney continued. But ultimately, she said, she owed her constituents a fair vote on the nominee's overall qualifications.

"There is a definite feeling that the private lives of public people are now open to scrutiny," she said, mentioning the news coverage given to former presidential candidate Gary hart and Defense Secretary nominee John Tower.

"No one knows better than the governor of the commonwealth that one's public life and private life are no longer separated," Dukakis observed without commenting directly on Meagher.

Councilor Edward O'Brien of Easthampton said he shared many of Tierney's concerns and said "this is not an easy nomination."

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Investigate a problem thoroughly before making any accusations. Hasty criticisms could earn you some real enemies and lead to embarrassment. Group activities hold more appeal than usual this evening. Try something new.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You enjoy greater rapport with your relatives now. Family members may surprise you with a plan they quietly developed behind the scenes. Be open to new ideas; romance is intriguing.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Other people give your wishes high priority. Return their affection. A friendship may be undergoing a subtle change. Do not become alarmed; the results will be pleasing to all concerned. Repay favors.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Be aware of the close relationship that is developing between certain friends. Their intimacy could affect you in a way you do not like. Avoid all forms of gambling. A "sure thing" flops.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) A friend offers sound financial guidelines that will make your planning easier. Show your appreciation. Participating in a religious activity gives your spirits a welcome lift. Reach out to those who share your values.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Celebrate an anniversary with style, but remain within your budget. You will enjoy yourself more if bills are not a problem. Continuing certain traditions means a great deal to older family members. Cooperate.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) challenges can be easily handled if you remain true to yourself. Family relationships could be troublesome. While you were dreaming on your pillow, others were planning a surprise. Be a good sport.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Satisfy an urge to travel by getting in touch with people at a distance or learning more about foreign places. There are new worlds to explore; consult your family before planning a vacation.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Steer a middle course between intellectual and emotional responses. Willpower is essential. Your thoughts turn to love and romance throughout the day. Work at salvaging a relationship you still want.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Caution is advised if travel is part of your day's plan. Communication with people at a distance proves gratifying. Romance sparkles. Do not ask for a commitment until ready to make one.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Tact and understanding are vital when dealing with others. In the late afternoon and early evening, be sure to turn on the charm. A wonderful financial opportunity is part of the picture.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Look forward to a major shift in the near future. Reach out for new friends and new avenues of expression. Your personal magnetism is so strong, others cannot help responding to you.

'New' cocaine population evident in emergency rooms

BOSTON (AP) – It's 8 o'clock on a holiday evening and about a dozen people wait in the lobby of Boston City Hospital's emergency room, some slumped in the vinyl covered chairs, some pacing fretfully.

Behind the swinging doors, emergency chief Dr. Peter Moyer is called to the puzzling case so deeply into unconsciousness he can barely be roused by two physicians.

"Have you taken any drugs?" doctors ask. "Cocaine, heroin, marijuana?"

It's a question that has become more and more commonplace in emergency rooms already burdened by increased patient loads.

"There is an emergency in the emergency room right now in not only New York and Boston but around the country and for a variety of reasons," said Ken Raske, president of the Greater New York Hospital Association.

Drugs, and their side effects of AIDS, violence and psychiatric disorders, play a role in the problems plaguing big-city emergency rooms, Raske said.

From 1986 to 1987, according to the National Institute on Drug Abuse, cocaine-related cases in emergency rooms increased 122 percent in the District of Columbia; 86 percent in both Boston and Atlanta; 80 percent in Detroit; 73 percent in Chicago; 53 percent in Minneapolis; 50 percent in texas, and 39 percent in New York City.

Heroin-related cases also increased in many cities but not as dramatically.

"The principal reason is the change in the typical cocaine user and the changes that have occurred within the cocaine epidemic," said Dr. Mark gold, director of research at Fair Oaks Hospital in Summit, NJ.

The typical cocaine user in 1983 was a college educated man in his 30s who earned more than $25,000 a year and snorted the drug, gold said. By 1987, only 16 percent were college educated, most took the drug by the more potent methods of sniffing vapors or injection, and most were unemployed and under 30.

In New York, from 1985 to 1987, hospital stays increased 15 percent for substance abuse patients, according to a study by the United Hospital Fund and the Bigel Institute for Health Policy at Brandeis University.

Counting the number of overdoses is only half the picture. There are also accidents caused by clouded senses and violence associated with soured drug deals, Gold said. "Some of the coroners report cocaine-related deaths and include a person who has cocaine in his blood and a bullet in his head."

Explained Comeau, "I was young, coming out of a small town, I didn't really know what was going on. I really wasn't sure what I wanted to do. I knew if I came here I could take a look at my future. I could play football for a few years and figure out what I was going to do."

It appears that if Comeau decides on baseball, with the big bat he swings, he could definitely have a future in sports.

"He's definitely a power hitter," said UMass coach Mike Stone. "He only played half a season last year and still hit 12 home runs."

Comeau likes adding to his own impressive statistics but, as far as goals go, he is more team oriented.

"I would really like for us to win the A-10 tourney," he said. "We've finished second the last two years, so we could definitely get that."

The final turnout this year will be the result of a team effort on the part of the Minutemen but you can be sure that Drew Comeau will have a big hand it.

After all, success in UMass baseball is a Comeau family tradition.

Dave Telgheder, a co-captain of this year's team, won eight games, including three shutouts, for the Minutemen last year.

NCAA hoop contest news

Proving once again that journalists are lousy mathematicians, we (actually, sports editor Jim Clark screwed up – please, no more phone calls) managed to totally butcher our plans for this year's scoring system in yesterday's paper.

And, showing that we are also indecisive, we are changing it again (the last time – we promise). So here goes:

First round games will be worth one point, second round games two and third round games three. Regional final games will increase to five, with the Final Four worth eight and the championship game 13. All this adds up to 137 total points.

Remember, all entries MUST be in by 11 a.m. today. If you're going to be late, don't even bother.

Kern, who hit .361, will make the switch from third to first and Comeau will be the designated hitter. Last season, Comeau broke the UMass records for most home runs in a season (12) and career (21) [see related story, this page].

"If we come out and swing the bat well, we could surprise some people," Stone said. "And Kern, [Drew] Seccafico, [Mike] Chambers and [Jack] Card have all improved their hitting."

Seccafico, Chambers and Card will "play themselves into positions in the outfield," Stone said.

And Richardson, who was 4-1 with two saves and a 1.39 ERA last year, will lead a bullpen corps that will feature Bill Vickers, Dan O'Leary (a transfer from Brandeis) and Rob Graziano.

"We had a good fall season," Stone said. "But we're playing for real now and I'm anxious to see what will happen."

Stone should get his first indication Saturday, when the Minutemen are scheduled to open their 11-game Southern trip with a game against Iowa.

"We'd like to come back with a .500 record or better," Stone said. "But the competition down there will be pretty good."

The regular season will get underway March 28 when UMass plays host to the University of Connecticut, and the Atlantic 10 season begins April 1, when the Minutemen open a four-game series against St. Joseph's University.

"We've been working hard and tapering down for the season," Stone said. "A lot of other teams think we're facing a rebuilding year but we'd rather call it a reloading year."

UMass baseball faces question marks

Steve Kern will see two changes this season, moving from third base to first base, and acting as co-captain of the Minutemen.

Performance of the freshmen, pitching staff will dictate the success of this year's team

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

There is an old saying that you can measure a baseball team by its strength up the middle: pitcher, catcher, second base, shortstop and centerfield.

If that measurement is reliable, and it usually is, the University of Massachusetts faces some serious questions this season.

The Minutemen went 36-16 last season, winning the New England Championship and finishing second in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

The catching spot is still up in the air between Louis Olivieri and Derek Dana, and will probably be determined on the Florida trip.

Freshmen Tom Murray and Biagini will start at third and second respectively, according to Stone.

Stone said freshman Glen DiSarcina, Gary's younger brother, will be the starting shortstop, and Glen is rumored to be almost as slick of a fielder as his brother, who is now in the California Angels orginization.

Freshman Rich Graham and Brian Conroy (a transfer from Northeastern) will be in the starting rotation, and Stone said freshman Brian Bright is making a strong bid for the starting centerfield position.

> "A lot of other teams think we're facing a rebuilding year, but we'd rather call it a reloading year."
> – UMass coach Mike Stone

Any UMass baseball fan would salivate when thinking about what could have been this year, with only centerfielder Matt Sheran, pitcher Steve Allen, and second baseman Darrin O'Connor graduating.

On top of that, UMass coach Mike Stone says he has a freshman second baseman named Dan Biagini, who is already a better hitter and fielder than O'Connor was.

But the potential for this dream season was seriously damaged by Major League Baseball's amateur draft last June.

In addition to Allen, starting pitchers Ken Greer and Mike Owens, shortstop Gary DiSarcina and catcher Dean Borrelli were selected and all signed.

As a result, when the Minutemen leave for their Florida trip tomorrow morning, nine of the 22 players on the travel roster will be freshmen.

"There's no question we have a lot to prove," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We've got some players, but the talent is young."

And it will show in the positions up the middle.

Four of the five starters will be new to the UMass starting rotation. And in all likelihood, the starting catcher, three of the four infielders, and possibly an outfielder will be freshmen.

"We'll start five young guys," Stone said.

That's a lot of freshmen, and therefore, a lot of question marks. But it is the veterans who will anchor the Minutemen.

Senior righthander Dave Telgheder returns to lead the pitching staff. Last season, Telgheder went 8-2 with a 3.48 earned run average, and led the staff in shutouts with three.

Telgheder, who struck out 61 batters last season while walking just 19, will be a co-captain with Steve Kern this year.

Don Strange, a short reliever last year, will join the starting rotation this season.

"I'm confident Strange can make the switch," Stone said. "[Reliever Jeff] Richardson could be a starter, too, but we need a strong righthander out of the bullpen."

A transfer, lefthander Paul Ciaglo, will round out the starting rotation. Ciaglo was the ace at Springfield College last season, posting a 3-3 record with a 2.32 ERA.

In 50⅓ innings, Ciaglo gave up 37 hits, walkd 30 batters and struck out 46.

Two of the top hitters from last year's team, Kern and Drew Comeau, will be back this year.

Following some huge footsteps

Drew Comeau is matching his brother on the baseball field

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Staff

When Todd Comeau left the University of Massachusetts in 1985 he had rewritten the baseball team's record book. He held the career records for home runs and runs batted in, season records for hits, runs scored and RBIs, and placed in the top two in doubles and home runs in a season.

Now, his younger brother Drew is trying to follow in his footsteps. And so far, he is doing a pretty good job.

Drew Comeau is entering only his junior year of eligibility with UMass baseball and already he has broken the home run records for a season (12) and career (21).

"Of course there's some pressure to do as well as [Todd] did," Drew said. "[But] we kept it kind of in the family, so it wasn't so bad."

Due to past injuries which have limited his range, Drew has been relegated to designated hitter and part-time first base for this season, but he really just wants to contribute what he can to the team.

Said Comeau, "I'd like to be out [playing first base] more. It's more fun out there."

Fortunately, the injuries appear to be a thing of the past.

"I had knee surgery during baseball season last year, and I played football last fall and I haven't felt any problem with it," he said.

Besides being alike in their power-hitting, both Comeaus were two-sport athletes, playing football as well as baseball. Despite how time-consuming it is, Drew says he enjoys playing two sports.

"I think playing two sports breaks up the seasons," Comeau said. "It keeps things fresh. On the other hand, it hurts because while you're playing the other sport someone else is trying to take your position. It goes both ways."

By playing two sports, Comeau is keeping his options open.

But that's not to imply that he lacks anything in baseball. Comeau was drafted by the New York Yankees out of North Branford High School in North Branford, Conn., and is often in touch with pro scouts. He chose instead to attend UMass, as a sport management major, before looking toward the big leagues.

Democrats: party future threatened

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

The future of the Democratic Party is in jeopardy unless it gains an identity and understands its ideological base, two nationally-known members of the party said last night.

Former US Senator Paul Tsongas told an audience of about 60 that the Democratic Party has no base. "It has given it up, and now we must bring it back."

Richard Goodwin, a speechwriter for Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, with whom Tsongas exchanged views, said that the party has to take abstracts issues and make them rallying points for the people.

"It can be done. [Franklin Delano] Roosevelt did it by simplifying the issues," he said.

Tsongas said, "If I were running [for president] in 1992, my platform that was traditionally pro-women's rights, pro-gay rights, pro-perestroika and against aid to the Contras" would shift to pro-business.

He said worldwide the United States is losing its identity. "United States' wealth is being distributed overseas," he said, referring to foreign investors "gobbling" up American capital.

American assets total $2.5 trillion and foreign ownership accounts for $1 trillion, according to Tsongas.

"The United States is being out-hustled [by foreign investors]. Workers are losing their will, discipline, dedication to work, ethics and commitment to competitors," he said. "The new nationalism out there has to appeal to the worker."

Tsongas said his party's ultimate aim is an America owned by America.

Goodwin, wearing a green necktie and striped shirt in honor of St. Patrick's Day, said, "A decision must be made by the Democratic Party on what role is to be played."

He agrees with Tsongas that government should be pro-business. In order to do this the government must "keep the market open and competitive, innovate and cut prices and costs. It must also provide infrastructure, technology and knowledge."

"A lack of competitiveness is holding back American businesses," Goodwin said. "Workers are becoming automatons. They could and should be highly motivated," he said.

"Business did better under [F.D.R.] and Kennedy. The genetic structure of people has not changed, but something in the system has. Managers are looking for short-term profits for themselves and have less concern for long-term benefits," Goodwin said.

The panel was moderated by former UMass Political Science Professor George Goodwin, unrelated to the political analyst. The forum was sponsored by the Amherst Democratic Town Committee and the University Democrats.

26 new senators elected

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The results of the Undergraduate Student Senate elections were released yesterday, with 26 new senators scheduled to join the Student Government Association next semester.

The release of Tuesday's election results was stalled because vote tallying for the SGA presidential and student trustee races took precedence over the senate race, said Holly Brod, co-elections coordinator.

In the Southwest Residential Area, Frank Martin claimed nearly 60 percent of the vote to become a senator for John Quincy Adams Residence Hall and write-in candidate John Grant was elected senator for nearby John Adams Residence Hall.

Write-in candidates Jeff Filipov and David O'Hearn both claimed victories in two open senate positions in Washington Residence Hall and Kimberly Hudson received more than 75 percent of the vote in Kennedy Residence Hall, joined by write-in candidate Craig Brown.

In Pierpont Resident Hall, Ted Marvelias edged Tim Wood and Frank Sileo was victorious in James Residence Hall with only four votes.

In the Orchard Hill Residential Area, Victoria Clement defeated co-candidates Craig Donais and Pat McGillicuddy to become a senator from Grayson Residence Area.

Leslie Abbott was re-elected from the Northeast Residential Area as a senator from Crabtree Residence Hall. Janine Getek held more than 60 percent of the votes from Mary Lyon Residence Hall, defeating two opponents.

Write-in candidate Joe Rapoza was victorious in Hamlin House with eight votes and Maria Crespo, the lone candidate from Dwight House, was elected with 13 votes.

The Sylvan Residential Area filled its two open senate seats, electing co-Senators-elect Jane Coffin and Shana Corby from Brown House and Chris Dreikosen from Federal financial aid increase in doubt

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

On their annual trip to Washington last week, Students Advocating Financial Aid blanketed Capitol Hill expressing the concerns of financial aid recipients across the country while acknowledging that increasing aid programs is not easy.

Many of the issues they discussed with congressmen, senators and legislative aides such as national service proposals, default rates on student loans and the seeming callousness of the Bush administration toward the plight of needy students are important, but they only scratch the surface of a complex federal budget process.

At first glance, Congress appears to be able to cut any cost in the budget, but this is not the case, said Karl Knapp, assistant for research and policy analysis for the National Association of Financial Aid Administrators.

In fact, Congress has only about 14 percent of the total federal budget to cut from, Knapp said.

Of this 14 percent, financial aid makes up 0.8 percent, or about $13 billion, and educational programs in general about 1.1 percent, he said. Foreign and domestic programs take up the rest, he added.

The remaining 86 percent is broken down into almost untouchable programs and fixed costs, he said.

For example, Knapp pointed out that 14.4 percent of the budget is needed to pay the interest on the nation's $170 billion yearly deficit.

Of the 28.8 percent allotted for military expenditures, most is used to pay fixed salary and defense contract costs and therefore immune to cuts, and 44.8 percent funds entitlement programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, Knapp said.

Entitlement programs are protected by laws that automatically increase their budgets at least at the rate of inflation, he said.

In other words, these programs are also never cut.

Another hindrance to establishing a firm footing for financial aid programs is Bush's lack of direction on this year's federal fiscal dilemma, said Dallas Martin, president of NASFAA.

Bush has not given enough indication as to which programs are going to be adequately funded and which will be cut, he said. This severely hampers lobbyists' efforts to influence the budget for financial aid, Martin said.

Representative Barney Frank, D-Mass. echoed this sentiment in a speech for SAFA students.

"It is not clear what the president wants to do. It is hard to lay your finger on a Bush policy in a lot of areas," he said.

Frank also said the only way to increase the money available for student aid and other programs, short of raising taxes —

Arson squad investigating blaze

SPRINGFIELD — The city arson squad was called in yesterday to investigate a blaze that destroyed a little business complex but stopped short of a string of fuel storage tanks called "Gasoline Alley."

"It looks like there was a terrible amount of damage," said Jay Hirsch, owner of Frank Paper Co. Inc., which was gutted by the early morning fire.

An unidentified caller reported an explosion at 5:15 a.m. at Northeast Recycling Corp., a paper-recycling plant near the Armory Street rotary three miles northeast of downtown Springfield, said George Placanico, a fire department spokesman.

The fire quickly spread to other businesses on the dead-end street, which include a paper mill, a metal-recycling plant, a moving and storage company and an auto parts firm. Smoke was visible from Connecticut, some 15 miles away.

Fire Chief Raymond Sullivan said the billowing flames were fed by brisk winds but were brought under control three hours later. By that time, three buildings had collapsed and at least two others had been gutted.

Activist discusses FBI surveillance

By ALETHEA O'DONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

The fear of knowing the US government may have you under surveillance because of alleged "un-American activities" was not only legitimate during the McCarthyism of the 1950s, but a relevant fear today, a political activist said Wednesday night.

Frank Wilkinson, executive director of the National Committee against Repressive Legislation [NCARL], told a small Campus Center Auditorium audience of his experiences as an opponent of the now-defunct House Committee on Un-American Activities, run by former FBI head J. Edgar Hoover. Wilkinson said HUAC was the root of McCarthyism and the "red scare."

"I learned when I was 65 years of age that I had been under surveillance by the FBI since I was 25," he said. "I never knew it; I never saw an FBI agent. Yet by hindsight, my whole life was altered not only by the surveillance, but also by the disruption of individuals which they target."

Wilkinson said he began his career in the 1940s, working for integrated housing in the slums of Los Angeles, but was targeted by HUAC for "Un-American activities." He was removed from his government job in 1952 for refusing to name all the organizations to which he had belonged since 1931.

He said he was subpoenaed by the HUAC in 1958. He refused to answer question regarding his political activities, and was subsequently jailed for one year in 1961.

Wilkinson said he looked into files the FBI had on him, and "finally the FBI admitted that they had 132,000 pages of surveillance on me for a period of 40 years. It was estimated that the FBI had spent 17 million dollars to follow me."

Wilkinson said he discovered, upon reading the FBI files, the bureau had known of a plotted assassination attempt on his life. Wilkinson produced a document, dated March 4, 1964. The document, sent from the FBI agent-in-charge in Los Angeles to J. Edgar Hoover, named "the agents who will stake out the residence to witness my assassination."

The FBI never warned Wilkinson of the plot, he said.

In 1987, Wilkinson won a lawsuit filed against the FBI for violation of his constitutional rights. However, he said he was skeptical as to whether the FBI had ceased their surveillance activities.

He believes the newly-formed Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, created by President Reagan, is simply another form of HUAC.

"We've dropped the term communism," he said, "the new way of looking at you is that you are terrorists."

"Each of you is in great jeopardy legally under the Reagan guidelines," he said. "It is legally possible for an FBI or CIA agent to be on this campus spying upon what you say, what you think. The same things that [went] on in my generation is now applicable to you."

NCARL has developed a petition which campaign for an end to "political spying or disruption by the FBI," he said.

Wilkinson, sponsored by the Distinguished Visitor's Program, said he and others who developed the petition believe the FBI's purpose is not political, but criminal investigations.

"It is something that I know is going to be very successful," he said. "The meat of the petition is having the FBI develop a criminal standard forbidding them from violating the First Amendment."

Groups to have day in court

The Spartacus League and the University of Massachusetts Republican Club, who have fought each other in the past, will meet again March 28, this time in court.

Members of both groups filed assault charges against each other last month after clashing in a Campus Center meeting room on Feb. 9.

The two groups brawled during the discussion portion of a forum held by the Spartacus League, who were invited to UMass by a student organization — the Friends of the Spartacus League.

The scuffle ensued when six members of the Republican Club were asked to leave. Tempers on both sides soon flared.

One Republican was treated at University Health Services after he was allegedly headbutted on the nose by a Spartacist during the fight.

Women lag in media, profs say

Statistics improving, but not enough women in authority

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Correspondent

Women are unequally represented in the media workforce but those statistics are slowly changing, three University of Massachusetts journalism professors said Wednesday.

Professor Karen List, the first speaker at the lecture sponsored by the Women's Studies Department as part of the Brown Bag Lunch series, reported from a University of Missouri survey that 36 percent of all editors, 13 percent of all directing editors and 7 percent of top management are women.

Out of 1,650 daily publications, only 60 are run by women publishers, she said. Women compose only 20 percent of foreign correspondence and write only 25 percent of front page bylines, she said.

"These statistics are improving, but not dramatically when you know journalism schools have 60-70 percent women," List said. "Women's salaries lag behind men's in every circulation category. Basically, women make 75 percent of what men are making and more specifically, women editors make 83 percent compared to men. It's some pretty distressing results."

Professor Madeline Blais, the recipient of the Pulitzer Prize for Feature Writing in 1980, said that although List's statistics seem dismal, statistics favoring women are gradually increasing. She used her two-year experience of being a Pulitzer juror to exemplify this progress.

Blais said, "During my two-year appointment, 13 percent of the Pulitzer board were women. Last year when I went to get my name tag, the name tags were pieces of paper folded to fit in a breast pocket, which I, unfortunately, forgot to bring. The next time, I brought a jacket, but the name tags were now fastened with pins. I give you that symbol as a symbol of hope."

List said she hopes an organization run by women editors called New Directions for News will redefine news to include issues important to women and children.

"New Directions holds a series of meetings with top level editors in two to three seminars to talk about these issues," List said. "Through this, they hope to desensitize people at the top to change the situation."

List said a study by the University of Maryland which cited higher numbers of female journalism students raised some interesting questions.

"Will being a journalist become a devaluated job like teaching? Will the watchdog function of the press on the government diminish as women are more tuned to harmony?" she asked.

Professor Sara Grimes said female journalism majors can battle these statistics.

"It's going to be a struggle," Grimes said, "because the definitions of success are defined by white men working 12 hours a day with a woman taking care of him. We're seeing more women becoming like men, giving up families, friendships, and hobbies for their careers."

'Cutback City' continues growth

"Cutback City" added four new shacks to its domain in a sudden rush of productivity this week, and its residents promise the miniature village by the campus pond will expand even further when students return from spring break.

The city was erected nearly one month ago by "Students for a Democratic University" to protest state budget cuts and has since grown to nine crudely-built shacks and one pup tent, which houses former student trustee candidate Al Arpad.

Signs encouraging students and faculty to spend time at the city are scrawled on the huts, including one reading, "We're in here, you're not. Think about it."

"We'd love to have the whole lawn full with as many people as possible," said resident Carolyn Conrad. "As long as you're here and you believe in money for the schools, you're welcome to stay."

About six students are planning to remain in the shacks during spring break next week, Conrad said. Exchange students and others who are unable to find housing during the break are also welcome to reside in the shacks, she said.

Warm weather conditions in recent weeks has attracted more than 25 overnight residents and "hundreds" of sup-

Speakers urge end to Third World arms sales

By STEVEN PANGIONE
Collegian Correspondent

Ballistic missile sales to Third World nations must be stopped to ensure a safe future for our world, a military expert told about 40 people at Hampshire College recently.

"The world is changing," Robert Shuey told the audience. "The super powers aren't the only ones making missiles anymore."

He said less-developed countries, like Iran, North and South Korea and Pakistan are making their own missiles from technology given to them from other countries. They are also developing nuclear weapons themselves, now, Shuey said.

Most of these countries are getting the technology to build missiles from others who sell them the missiles, he said.

"The Soviets have given eight different Third World countries missiles," he said, adding that the Soviets aren't the only ones selling missiles.

"There is a huge black market on missile sales because people can make a lot of money by selling them," he said. "But there is some effort to halt these sales."

The United States and six other countries have formed the Missile Technology Control Regime, he said. The organization requires companies from their countries to register with them and clear any sales to other nations the company may make.

The problem with this is that there are more than seven countries in the world, he said. "They are trying to get other countries to enter into this agreement with them, but none have joined so far." He said many countries are expected to join soon, though, because they are realizing what this proliferation could lead to.

PAWSS professor Michael Klare, speaking after Shuey, said even though countries are starting to halt nuclear and ballistic missiles, they continue to sell conventional weapons to them.

He said that although nuclear and chemical weapons sales has gone down in recent years, conventional weapon sales have gone up.

"Since the early 70's, there has been a tenfold increase in dollar value of arms sold, and the arms are becoming more sophisticated," he said. "Seventy percent of these are sold to Middle East countries and southern Asian countries." These are the countries that have been at war with each other, he said.

Conventional arms can lead to a nuclear war too, he said. "The war can start with conventional weapons and lead to nuclear weapons. People don't realize this," he said.

The only way to stop these sales is tougher regulations and more cooperation between developed countries, Shuey said. The Missile Regime is a start, but more countries need to join if anything is realistically going to happen to stop missile sales to Third World countries, he said.

The lecture was the fourth in a seven-part series on "Global Perils in the 1990s," sponsored by Peace and World Security Studies.

Pay party lines prove threatening

Pay-party lines are becoming a threat to American society that must be controlled or even stopped through legislation.

Pay-telephone lines may be harmful to our society. Surely it is only speculation to suppose that Americans who spend as much as $32/hr to party alone-but-not-alone, could be detrimental to the already crippled American Dream. However, there has been a new twist in the pay-party line industry.

Until now, you could call a celebrity or phone for your fortune for about 50 cents a minute ($2 for the first minute). You could even dial for sex and pay by credit card. While this may appear to be just a waste of time and money for users, one could speculate that pay-party lines add to the deterioration of American society. Up 'til now, pay-party lines have been little more of a threat to us than soap operas. But now, there is a new pay-party line in town and it's name is "Right to Life" (copyright, Tell the White House Inc.).

"Right to Life" is a pair of party lines. If you believe in the right to life, you would call one number. If you are a pro-choice advocate, you'd call a different number. The coporate name and the television ad imply that you are sending a message to the White House. If it is true that a person who calls one of these numbers is influencing statistics that our government will see, then we are indeed threatened.

First, this is costing the voter money to vote. This is in direct conflict with the voter's rights under the Constitution. Second, the people who are voting by party lines are not an accurate cross-section of the American people.

The act of calling "Right to Life" party line partitions the voter into a group who may share other views. This would sway the outcome of the votes. These two threats are based on the assumption that calling Tell the White House Inc. is influencing decisions made in the White House.

If, on the other hand, Tell the White House Inc. is not telling the truth and your call does not influence decisions, they are guilty of fraud. In the same way that mail fraud is illegal, pay party line fraud should be illegal.

A day that means more than canned beef and green beer

Today is the big day for all of the Irish. Or at least it's supposed to be. Most of you must be able to tell from my last name that I'm at least partially Irish. However, I don't always celebrate the 17th of March in the traditional American way.

It's Saint Patrick's Day! The day we celebrate Irish heritage, being converted to Catholicism, drink green beer, wear green and maybe go to a parade.

Pamela McCarthy

I usually don't participate in the festivities. I will wear green (this year it will be a very trendy olive-drab or greyish green, I'm not sure which yet). I like green clothes, green grass and green eyes, but I don't like green beer, green cookies or anything else in an altered green state.

Drinking has always been a big deal on Saint Patrick's Day. My extended family (all 48.5 of them) generally toss a few, but my immediate family doesn't make a big production out of the malted aspect of the day. I have nothing against a party. I will never hold it against anyone who has a few beers to celebrate the "Fighting Irish." But it does strike me as peculiar that so many of the Irish-Americans who get angry when the words "Irish" and "drunk" are said in the same breath, go out and get slammed on the 17th of March in protest.

In addition to drinking, some of us try to choke down the traditional Irish corned beef and cabbage meal. I like corned beef, about once a year. I don't like boiled cabbage, boiled potatoes or boiled carrots. I'm convinced that boiled food is a punishment from God. For 19 Saint Patrick's Days, I complained about the menu. I was told to just shut up and eat. After all, it's part of my heritage. It was good enough for Irish immigrants, it's good enough for me.

Whenever I hear this age-old lecture, I always point out that immigrants only ate corned beef because it was cheap; it's not cheap anymore. If we are going to spend money on beef, I'd rather we buy steak. I'm sure if Irish immigrants could have, they would have feasted on prime rib, duck and lobster.

Instead of eating the stuff my great-grandparents had to eat, why don't we eat what they wanted to eat? I think we should buy lobster, duck, steak, shrimp or some other expensive food. We should stuff our faces and remember that we haven't always had it so good.

Besides it's a Friday during Lent, a day when all good Catholics refrain from eating meat, so we are going to have to eat something besides corned beef. (Maybe the lobster?) The day commemorates a nation being converted to Catholicism, St. Paddy himself was Catholic and many Irish still are today.

I've never gotten to celebrate Saint Patrick's Day the way I wanted to. In fact, I think most people miss the point of the holiday. We are supposed to be celebrating our heritage and our history. Drinking green beer and acting like idiots doesn't increase my appreciation of Irish culture. I don't hear much about the myths of the "little people," (leprechauns, fairies and the like). I do know that the shamrock is supposed to bring good luck, or have good powers, but I'm not sure why. Ireland has a long list of brilliant writers, with such distinguished names as James Joyce, but when your slamming down 10 green beers you don't tend to think about such classics as Finnegan's Wake. I rarely hear any Celtic tales or old Irish superstitions on Saint Patrick's Day. I finally learned one from my cousins, last semester, and was shocked to discover it is bad luck to put shoes on the table. (I just thought it was gross.)

This year I will wear green, again, and if I can find a shamrock, I'll wear that, too. I hope we don't have corned beef and cabbage again. (I will remind my parents that we can't eat meat on Lent, but they will probably laugh in their religiously apathetic daughter's face.) Maybe I'll check a James Joyce book out of the library and celebrate in my own way.

Try to have class

I stood working in the DC one night taking dirty silverware off of trays. A tray came by with a napkin on it which said, "You're a bunch of d—ckheads." Nice. A few minutes later, another napkin printed with an obscenity floated by. Within a minute, a third napkin came through with the word "a—holes." Excuse me? Did my doing dirty silverware offend you?

How about this scenerio, the DC worker goes out to fill napkins. With his nicest voice and politest smile, he says "excuse me" to two students standing in front of the dispensers. They don't move, but look at him as if to say, "You are a lowly DC peon and I'm not lowering myself to get out of your way."

These things happen all of the time. Entire floors go to eat, and entire floors leave their trays on the table. Is it such a grave strain to walk fifteen feet to bring them up? These same people have the stamina to party at least three times a week, yet they're too feeble to lift a tray? Whatever happened to common courtesy? DC workers are not a bunch of low-lifes. We're just like everybody else, except some people on this campus need to work for a living.

We don't expect miracles, but have a heart. Just because you know how to be an idiot, is not a good excuse for being one. Pick up a tray, try saying "please," and try to have some class.

Symbol of America

Who does Joseph Rubin think he is? I don't care what he does in the privacy of his own home, but to take the American flag and tape it to the floor for people to walk on is an outrage. He may not agree with the policies of the United States, but the flag does not represent American policy. He may try to say he was expressing himself through art, but what he is expressing and the media by which he tried to do it are not acceptable.

The flag is the symbol of the United States for all those who live here or who live under it in other lands. Is there something he doesn't like about the flag? Does he see any message that is offensive? I certainly don't and have yet to meet anyone who does.

I am proud to live in America, but if he isn't, then he and any other member of the Radical Student Union should leave.

A letter for your parents at spring break

Spring Break.

The words alone may mean little, but the anticipation and the realization associated with the term means oh so much to the weary, bleary-eyed students of this and other campuses.

And the professors don't mind much either.

As this may be the one newspaper to reach the homes of many of my compadres, I feel it is necessary to deliver a message, on behalf of me and those who think like me, to all our parents.

Students: give the Collegian to parent or guardian.

David R. Mark

Dear parent or guardian:

Thank you for reading this newspaper. As many of you know, this is a hectic time for many of the students at the University of Massachusetts. Budget cuts, racial disturbances and unethical student government candidates have wreaked havoc on your son or daughter.

That's why I ask — beg if necessary — that you be understanding and kind during this short interlude between midterms, 20-page papers and oral reports. Be kind to your next of kin when they inform you of their waning bank accounts, faltering grades or sexually transmitted diseases.

They are only human.

Remember, even when you want to do bodily damage to your son or daughter, they love you, even if they don't show it, and haven't shown it in years. In fact, even if they swear upon their graves and the Holy Bible that they don't love you, or even want to see, or hear or know of your existence, realize they've probably been to one too many of our University's rallies, protests and demonstrations, and are merely suffering from nervous tension and perhaps one of those sexually transmitted diseases I mentioned previously.

Push them to study over their break. For by studying they accomplish two goals: Their grades improve and the University has more ammunition to launch against Gov. Dukakis and all his "Harvard and MIT are better" talk.

And finally, feed your son or daughter properly, because if you saw what they ate in the Dining Commons, or bought at the Dairy Mart, you'd grimace. If you knew how many Spaghetti-Os and glasses of Kool-Aid they've had, you'd agree that many of our students need whatever the "specialty" of your house is.

That's it, thanks for reading.

David R. Mark
News Editor, Collegian

P.S. Please give the Collegian back to your son or daughter.

O.K., are they gone?

Whew, I think they may go for it.

Hey, I realize you're probably on the beach or something, and this paper is sitting in a bag. You may have even left this on the floor of the Peter Pan bus or the Eastern Shu . . . Oh, yeah. No one takes the shuttle.

Have a good break. Don't die or anything. Try to put on some sun screen, since the ozone layer is decaying and you wouldn't want to be covered in ozone. I hear it's hard to wash out.

Don't forget that you are students. Don't act too grown up or anything when you're way down south.

When you do see your parents, remember to deliver the same or similar sob story as you see above. I'd hate to have you look bad because you were unprepared for the most important pop quiz of all — the one given by your parent or guardian.

Finally, do our University proud. No, I mean it. This school has suffered under it's "we're not a zoo" attitude. Party hearty and say hi to the MTV veejays. Ken Ober went to school here, you know.

Munchausen sets the pace for spring releases

By JIM COLE
Collegian Staff

At last, hope is in sight. The pre-spring doldrums are coming to an end, and a decent crop of new movies are slowly replacing the duds we've suffered with for the past couple months. First and foremost on my list is The Adventures of Baron Munchausen. I had high expectations for this film, and was not disappointed in the slightest. To sum it up, this is the best fantasy film I've seen in a long time.

The plot involves a small European city under attack by the Turkish army in the 18th century. To keep morale up, a small theater troup performs "The Adventures of Baron Munchausen" when they are suddenly interrupted by an irate old man who is indeed the real Baron. He insists their play is nothing but lies, and sets out to prove it by stopping the Turkish assault — with a trip to fantastic places like the moon, the center of the earth, and the belly of a sea monster, in search of his four old friends who were part of his original adventures (adventures based on the tales of a real-life cavalry officer Karl Friedrich Hieronymus).

THE SCREENING ROOM

The plot isn't the point of this film. The fantasy is. From the first scene, one is totally convinced in this world that Director Terry Gilliam (Time Bandits, Brazil) has created. He is truly an underappreciated genius, one of those rare directors who not only put a story on film, but a whole universe. The visuals, sets, special effects, everything add up to an experience that dazzles. Even the actors manage to shine with all the explosions and fx around them. As the Baron, John Neville adds dignity and wit to his role as "the world's greatest liar." Young Sarah Polley, seen in the PBS series Ramona, is wonderful as the Baron's plucky little companion, and Robin Williams' cameo as the Moon King is vintage lunacy.

Baron Munchausen could be labeled a children's film, as it is more upbeat than Gilliam's Brazil, but it is much more. Plenty of adult wit abounds, and even in the few slow spots, the images still hold attention. So what if the film went overbudget (40 million $), for it is still a success; a witty fable in a day when the fantasy film was starting to die. Not anymore.

Other worthwhile films include New York Stories, an anthology piece of three seperate stories. Though I've not seen it yet, I hear the pieces by Martin Scorcese and Woody Allen are knockouts, but Francis Coppola's is a miss. If so, best to bring a walkman to the theater, and tune out for a while. It's still worth it for the other two.

Opening tomorrow is Leviathan, yet another underwater horror flick. The good news are star Peter Weller (Robocop), and co-writer David Peoples (Blade Runner). The bad news is director George Pan Costamatos (Cobra, Rambo II). Maybe there's hope. Also appearing is Fletch Lives, featuring the return of Chevy Chase in one of the few roles that fit him. This sequel is "inspired" by Gregory McDonald's novel, and the emphasis will be more on sight gags and characters, as the script was unfinished and could not be reworked due to the writer's strike. Let's hope improvisation wins out.

For those who will be staying in the valley, Pelle the Conqueror is a MUST. Playing at the Pleasant Street Theater, it follows the struggles of a worn out laborer Lasse (Max Von Sydow in his Academy Award-nominated performance) and his young son Pelle (Pelle Hvengaard) struggling against hardships on a rural farm in the 19th century. Filled with colorful characters and stunning imagery, it packs a surprising emotional punch, even though the movie is long. Yes, it might not be for everybody, but is still worth a try.

Enjoy the well-deserved break. I'll be checking out the film world in L.A., but will probably be back. Probably.

Home video picks for Spring Break homebodies

By DOUG MIDDLETON
Collegian Correspondent

Some of us unfortunate souls will not be in the Bahamas next week (especially those who think they're going but have reservations with Eastern), and will be trying to enjoy our beloved hometowns; complete with annoying siblings and overbearing parents (Hey, at least the food is decent). Instead of torturing yourself with lame network offerings and umteenth repeats of HBO flicks, why not make a trip to the local video store? While you're at it, stop off at the local beverage outlet and pick up a cheap bottle of wine or a six pack to enhance your viewing pleasure.

Upon entering the video store, you will be bombarded by a plethora of titles. Here's a few of the nation's top rentals, according to every couch potato's bible, T.V. Guide.

(1) Die Hard: Bruce Willis meets The Towering Inferno, in this taut action piece. Terrorists hijack an L.A. skyscraper; and it's up to New York City cop Willis to save the hostages. The spectacular special effects, though, are considerably scaled down on the tube. One also has to overlook the F.B.I. characters, who act so unrealistically moronic, that they tarnish the credibility of the picture. A desperate last scene leaves a bad taste, but overall, this is a pulse-racer.

(2) Red Heat: Arnold Schwartzenegger as a Russian cop, trades barbs with wise-guy cop Jim Belushi. Average formula fare, right down to the obligatory concluding chase scene; but this time the pursuit involves Greyhound buses. Rent Arnie's The Terminator, instead.

(3) Bull Durham: One of last year's best films. Kevin Costner, Susan Sarandon, and Tim Robbins, star in this comedy set against a minor-league backdrop. The film was written and directed by Rob Shelton, who spent some time in the minor leagues. His experience rubs off on the film and gives it a ring of authenticity. Not surprisingly, Oscar ignored this one.

(4) The Dead Pool: Vintage Dirty Harry, as Clint Eastwood investigates murder and mayhem involving a sleazy filmmaker. The best scene cleverly spoofs the tiresome car chase convention so prevalent in this type of film.

5) The Great Outdoors: Dan Akyroyd continues his plunge into career-ruining movies, in this pathetic John Hughes comedy. Highlight involves co-star John Candy being attacked by a grizzly.

(6) Beetlejuice: Bizzare comedy with Alec Baldwin and Geena Davis playing a couple who die, and are forced to stay and haunt their house. They try to scare the new owners out with the aid of "Beetlejuice", a ghost played with the ghoulishly obnoxious charm of Michael Keaton. Funniest bits have Baldwin and Davis trying to be effective ghosts with the help of a "how-to-haunt" manual. The film's funky design is thanks to director Tim Burton, who gave the world Pee Wee's Big Adventure.

These are some of the most popular rentals currently; but if you're not in the mood for a recent commercial film, wander off to the Hitchcock shelf, or the cult films. Try Hitchcock's 1972 Frenzy, or John Water's indescribable Polyester; starring the late, great Divine, for a change of pace. I hope everyone has a relaxing break and is on a beach instead of in front of a VCR; but if you are, happy viewing.

A modern look at Shakespeare

By JOHN O'LEARY
Collegian Correspondent

The Merchant of Venice
Rand Theatre
March 15

Umbrellas, jogging suits and cordless telephones. This is Shakespeare?

It certainly is if you happen to be watching the UMass

Theater

Theater Department's presentation of the Merchant of Venice, showing through Saturday at the Rand Theater.

The message of the contemporary setting was clear. The themes and issues addressed in the play - anti-semitism, racial prejudice, and the role of women - are social problems that are with us even today. With dialogue that was true to Shakespeare throughout, the modern backdrop emphasized the timeless nature of the play's moral theme. The result was quite effective.

The key figure in any performance of the Merchant of Venice is the money-lending Jew, Shylock. This presentation was anchored by the presence of Professor Harry Mahnken of the Theater Department in the crucial role. An anachronistic presence in the modern setting, he gave the part a dual aspect which demanded the anger and sympathy of the audience. His bitter thirst for revenge in the climactic courtroom scene is understandable in light of the injustices heaped upon him earlier.

A very strong performance was also turned in by senior theater major Kathleen Wilson in the role of Portia. The humorous adventures of the suitors who come for the hand of the Belle of Bellemont were played for all they were worth. It must be difficult to quote Shakespearian dialogue as a nightclub singer (Peg Aloi) steps out of a casket to sing "All that Glitters is not Gold."

Such were the chances taken by director Richard Trousdell. The modern effects could at times be distracting, but more often they infused the play with original humor. It was remarkable how easy it was to accept Shakespearian dialogue from someone wearing Reeboks. I can't say that I'd like to see all of his plays produced in the same manner, but in this case it was quite acceptable.

Overall the play had a strong cast, and the stage and lighting were well done. Especially strong in supporting roles were Daniel Varrichione as the loud mouth Gratiano and Amanda Percival as Jessica. It is Jessica who has the most disturbing character in the play, because her position is never really resolved. She keeps the audience thinking about the real point of the play, which is the destructive role prejudice plays in the lives of individuals.

The play continues until Saturday evening, and if you want to see a contemporary rendition of a master work, I recommend it.

Amherst student turns tables on Taming of the Shrew

By AMIE FINKELSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

The Taming
Fayerweather Studio Theater, Amherst College
March 15

Wednesday night, the Amherst College Department of Theater and Dance presented The Taming, and adaptation of Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew.

Directed by Amherst College student J. Stirling Friendly, The Taming was performed as a radical, feminist tragedy, unlike the original Shakespeare comedy. Friendly wanted to portray a feminist view and give the audience a different look at Shakespeare.

The dilemma of finding a suitor to marry Katherine, the untamed, uncivilized and savage woman dominated the story. Being the elder sister to Bianca, Katherine has to marry before her younger and more desired sister.

Hortensio, hoping to marry Bianca, schemes to find Katherine a husband and offers the opportunity to the money-hungry Petruchio.

The plot was smooth and moved quickly. Considering the work involved in performing Shakespeare, the cast proved to be on their toes throughout the show.

The leads, Suzanne Demcisak as Katherine and Jeff Eldredge as Petruchio, the suitor to receive twenty-thousand crowns in dowry when marrying the shrew, carried the performance to climax when finally, after beatings and threats of death, Katherine is taught that her husband is her lord and master and she must obey his every wish.

Petruchio flaunts his power over Katherine, and the strikingly sudden ending comes when, at her wits end, Katherine slits her "dear" husband's throat, composing the feminist attitude that differs from Shakespeare's original.

Friendly's adaptation of the classic received good response from the audience, providing a heart-warming feeling of modern equality.

porters to the city, Conrad said.

"We're going to see a lot more support," she said. "We're working to get more organized and more vocal. We need to be heard."

City residents also worked to educate students on the importance of acting against the cutbacks by sponsoring a "teach-in" early this week in the Cape Cod lounge.

History professor Bruce Laurie spoke to more than 30 students at the meeting, encouraging them to continue their efforts to combat further cuts.

"The lobbying worked, and the phoning was even more effective, but nobody can say they killed themselves over this in the past two weeks," Laurie said.

Laurie said he is optimistic about the cutbacks, and said "the battle is winnable."

something the President has repeatedly vowed not to do — is to take the funds out of the military budget.

But, according to Frank, Bush has said he plans to give the Pentagon real budget increases above inflation.

On a lesser scale, the student loan default rate is causing concern on Capitol Hill because the federal government is paying ever increasing amounts to pick up the tab for borrowers either unwilling or unable to pay back their loans, Martin said.

In the final analysis, no one seems to know where the budget axe is going to fall but financial aid, in one form or another, is definitely on the chopping block.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Thoughts you have had of financial distress may come true today. Beware of last-minute ideas regarding transportation. There are probably several strings attached.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) A Capricorn plays heavily into day's events. Work with others for mutual gains. Do not allow yourself the luxury of wasting time. Your personality is a big asset. Be your most charming self.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Be willing to extend yourself to a friend, relative or elder who may be in need. Make sure others listen to your goals and objectives. Remember, you count too!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Financial matters that have been troubling you will not be resolved today. Do not pressure others into finishing projects you know are beyond their abilities. Go dancing tonight, and look for someone special. Relax.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Spend your money wisely. There may not be much of it tomorrow if you are not careful. Good things for others come in small packages. Give your spouse flowers.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Voice your opinion on how project should be best completed. Your boss is wrong; let it be known. Don't listen to gossip from a neighbor. Be prepared to aid a small child.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Be careful with those you do not know well. Know yourself well, and others will be appreciative. Write a letter to an old friend.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Hold close to those you love, even if you can only be with them for a short time. Eat heartily, but do not embarrass yourself. It's time for a change in appearance, go buy something special for yourself!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Prepare for mood shifts in those you care about. They may not want to be near you. Don't be offended, just listen and care.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Saying goodbye is not easy. You know that, but you still don't want to leave loved ones. A goal to meet again should be discussed. It will be worth the wait.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Now is the time to discuss long-term goals. Forget your cares, and take time to smell the roses. Look at the forest, not just the trees!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Don't follow your regular routine today. It is not wise to be alone. Stay with those you love, even if it is an inconvenience.

Delta Chi helps charity

Fraternity works with businesses to help MS group

By LARA DMYTRYSHYN
Collegian Staff

Delta Chi fraternity at the University of Massachusetts and a local tavern are combating a crippling disease. Though not affected directly, members of the fraternity said they are concerned with eradicating the nemesis of young children.

The fraternity has targeted Multiple Sclerosis to be their charity and beneficiary. The devastating disease affects thousands each year, especially children, and has no known cure.

Thirty percent of the money raised by the fraternity this year has been donated to M.S.

The fraternity became interested in the Multiple Sclerosis Foundation when a brother living in the house mentioned his sister has the disease, according to Mitch Lass, a Delta Chi brother.

"When it hits closer to home, often you want to help out that person in need," Lass said.

Last fall, in conjunction with Domino's Pizza, Delta Chi raised $100 for M.S. Fraternity brothers raked leaves for residents of Amherst and the surrounding towns.

Lass, a member of Delta Chi for three semesters and currently fraternity treasurer, was responsible for organizing the fundraiser.

The money was given to Charlie's, a tavern in Amherst and one of many bars across the United States participating in a month long campaign started Feb. 28 to raise money for M.S.

Kathleen Fitzgerald, the tavern's assistant manager, said the bar sponsored numerous events, including a basketball tournament, to help raise money.

"The bars are a main source of donations received by Multiple Sclerosis," she said, citing the $4,000 the tavern raised last year.

Fitzgerald, an Amherst resident, has been involved with the campaign for two of the three years Charlie's has participated. "Delta Chi's concern helped a lot. Each year it seems more students become involved than the previous year," she said.

"The Greek Area people are not just social clubs. We enjoy doing philantropic events," Lass said.

Senators-elect Jay Bauer and Tim Buccairelli will represent Baker Residence Hall in the Central Residential Area and write-in candidate Susan Kelly edged Ken Canaway to claim victory in Brooks Residence Hall.

The Greek area elected four representatives, including co-Senators-elect Louisa Gould and Ingrid Jaeger, Geoffery Hosford, Jennifer Warmuth and T. Ashley Gauthier.

Eight senators were elected from the Commuter area, led by Shari Silkoff, who claimed nearly one-fourth of the 1,348 votes tallied. Silkoff was followed closely by her 1988 SGA co-presidential candidate Jason Rabinowitz, who received 22 percent.

Student activist Clarinda Rose-Turner, Michael Salat, Scott Peron, Paul Del Gallo, Mark Sermonian and co-senators Stacy Kinnamon and former Senate Speaker Robert Fadel were also elected.

Sooner or later, everybody's got to face the music.

Coach: Elaine Sortino

Johnson is hoping that Navy will try some difficult routines in order to raise its score to catch Penn State. If that happens and the Midshipmen are not able to execute, UMass could sneak up on them.

"We're matched up pretty good so if we go out and do our job, we'll come out on top," senior co-captain Bart Balocki said.

UMass is ranked 19th in the country and is third in the East, behind Navy and Penn State. There is also a lot at stake for the Minutemen in this meet besides the league title.

Senior co-captain John Eggers is currently ranked fifth in the east on the still rings. Senior Jay Ronayne is the No. 5 ranked high bar swinger in the east. The top four gymnasts in each event from the region will qualify individually for the NCAA's. Eggers and Ronayne need big scores this weekend to jump into the top four.

It's going to be a little harder for Ronayne than Eggers though. Tuesday, in practice, Ronayne tore some tendons in his left foot while attempting vault. He was sitting on the sidelines at Wednesday's practice but does not intend on doing the same this weekend.

"It will hurt when I vault but this is the last meet," Ronayne said. "I've got nothing to lose."

Says Johnson, "I think at this time of the year, we are as ready as we were at Syracuse or Springfield, where we had our best meets."

In the Syracuse meet, the Minutemen broke the school record for team score with a 268.05. They may have to do it again this weekend if they wish to win the first EIGL Championship in its history.

Last spring's graduation took from the Minutewomen five seniors, including Paige Kopcza, Lisa Rever, and co-captians Leigh Petroski and Chris Ciepiela. This year's model has restocked with new faces, and a tough attitude.

"They're gutty," said Sartino. "Of all the years I've been coaching here this is the most motivated and intense team I've ever had."

That the Minutewomen find themselves today in the company of giants is a tribute to the recent successes of the softball program. Last year's team piled up a 36-16 record and landed in second place in the Atlantic 10. In 1987 UMass compiled a similarly lofty 35-12 season mark, then swept the Atlantic 10 tourney. When it came NCAA time, however, the Minutewomen were overlooked, apperently because of the weakness of their schedule. Times have changed . . .

In the Atlantic 10 softball scene, Temple, Penn St. and Rutgers should be expected to make some noise in the league. UMass will also be looking to reheat their rivalries with Connecticut, Adelphi and Princeton.

"That's what were aiming for all year, we want to do well there," said Husted. Other key matches include a visit from Hawaii University, whom the coach called "top of the line," and tough encounters with UConn, Providence, and Dartmouth.

Husted believes that despite the difficult schedule, the youth, and limited practice time that this team can be successful.

He says, "We have the potential, all we have to do is go out there and show it."

Roberts said, "I'd like to do as well or better than we did in the fall." UMass finished 5th out of 32 teams in last year's New England Championships and he said he thinks this year they can move up a notch. "We want to take them this year, it would be nice, and if everything went right, we just might do it."

This year's championships will be April 29th and 30.

In place of a souvenier for the Boyden trophy chest, the Minutewomen would settle for some lofty scores, needed now — or never — if UMass is to earn itself a spot in the regional meet. UMass heads south today averaging 178.62 points per outing — well within reach of the seventh and final slot of the regional meet guest list.

Time is running out on the UMass' chances, however. When they return to Amherst two weeks hence, the Minutewomen will know for sure whether to leave their bags packed, or wash off the chalk dust for the final time this winter.

"This is very important meet in terms of qualifying scores," said Mitchell. "This is a good chance to show what you're capable of doing. The scoring will be very fair — this will be a fair test of people's abilities. And some of the judges we'll see will also be judging at regionals.

In the scramble for the seven individual slots reserved for top ranked all arounders at regionals, Erika Baxter and Kim Grady head into the weekend as the fourth- and fifth-ranked performers. Erin Klier is 12th, but stands just two-tenths of a point out of the running.

The Minutewomen took one on the collective chin last weekend at the University of Vermont, where they were handed their second loss of the season. The generally sluggish effort, coupled with some bizarre scoring, could have meant some of those intangible lasting psychological effects in these upcoming meets. But according to Mitchell, the troops "feel pretty good. We're a little run down, but it's just that time of the season, You expect it. But emotion will carry us through. We've put that (the Vermont loss) behind us."

Softball heads west for season opener

Toughest schedule ever for Minutewomen

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Some coaches go out of their way to save the early dates on the season's schedule for creampuffs and record-swelling. Not so for University of Massachusetts softball mentor Elaine Sortino, who penciled her squad onto the guest list for the "Budlite Tournament," underway as we speak in Sunvale, Calif.

There's really no better collection of softball teams to be seen between now and the NCAA tournament at season's end. Top ranked national powers such as, Utah, Indiana and UCal. Berkely are rubbing elbows with the Minutewomen in three days worth of action.

Before returning home at the end of break, the Minutewomen will continue down the coast to face Fresno State University, currently the top ranked team in the country.

"This is the most ambitious early season schedule of any team I've had," said Sortino. "We've been trying to get here for a while."

Now that they've made it 'there,' the Minutewomen are going to have to scrap to prove that they belong. With a young squad — and an unusually short roster — UMass jumps into action against teams that have already played two weeks of sun-soaked softball.

"We've got to start somewhere. We're young, but one nice thing about youth is that it's not afraid of anything," said Sortino.

The Minutewomen are a bit thin down the bench, as this year's roster lists just 13 eligible players. Injuries, academics and other maladies have left UMass, in the coach's words, "short on quantity, but not quality."

Sortino will lean on senior co-captians Barbara Meehan and Chris Wanner for both leadership and on-field production. Meehan is the top returning hitter at .309, while Wanner's resume lists an 0.92 ERA and a 13-2 record in 1988.

Freshman Holly Aprile will join Wanner in the alternating outfield/pitching role immediately. A host of sophomores, including Cherie DellAnno, Chris Collins, Jennifer Miller and Bonnie Schilling will move into the reshuffled infield and outfield openings.

Offensively, UMass will look to sparkplug Mary Duff to stir things up at Tennis teams gear up for spring seasons

● Minutemen mix experience with youth

By BRAD HALFOND
Collegian Correspondent

This spring the University of Massachusetts men's spring tennis team will find itself trying to improve further on the fall squad's 7-2 record.

"This team," said head coach Manny Roberts, "has an excellent mix of experience and youth and we're ready for the season."

The Minutemen only lost one player from last year and Roberts said, "the key to winning will be the players ability to stay mentally as well as physically prepared all year."

The experience for UMass comes from seniors Brian Gable and Humberto Soto and juniors Chris Johnson and Rich Stone. The rest of the team will be youthful as four freshmen (Paul Audet, Matt Murphy, Lenny Levine and Glenn Peck) attempt to make a name for themselves.

Roberts admits that UMass has a tough schedule. "No matches will be easy. Hartford, Hawaii, and Central Connecticut all will make this season a difficult one for us."

The Minutemen's first encounter will be against Hawaii in two weeks (March 31).

● New coach, new hopes for Minutewomen

By BRAD HALFOND
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team will begin this spring season with a different head coach and a more positive attitude.

Interim head coach Mike Husted says, "this year's team is working extremely hard and has a lot of desire to succeed." Husted adds that, "I want my players to realize their full physical, mental and emotional potential and then winning will occur."

Husted admits that this year's team is a young and upcoming one. The roster includes seven freshmen, three sophomores and only one senior. Husted said, "we're building for the long term, but several players are beginning now to just come into their own."

Some strong players that hope to help UMass improve on last year's 3-8 record include sophomores Christine Willse and Maura Foley, freshman Kere Eddy and senior Karen McShane.

The focal point of this year's season is the Atlantic 10 Championships set at Penn State, April 14 and 15th.

Tourney time for women's gymnastics

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

If your a local women's gymnastics junkie, there really couldn't be any better place to spend your spring break than sunny Washington DC and Philadelphia Pa. The beaches aren't crowded, the natives welcome the business, and for the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team (7-2), there are two weekends worth of prime competition waiting to be waged.

The Minutewomen will spend tomorrow afternoon sharing gym time at George Washington University with seven other Atlantic 10 schools, gathered for the annual league Championship meet. UMass will then travel to PA for a date with Temple and Northeastern University the following Saturday. National powers West Virginia (thankfully not listed in the Northeast regional standings; the barometer by which UMass is hoping to qualify for the regional meet), Penn St. and Temple are expected to finish in the top three slots. GWU, Rutgers, and the URI will also be joining the Minutewomen in action.

The Minutewomen have their eyes on the unclaimed fourth slot (UMass has never finished higher than fifth at the A-10's). Which isn't to say, of course, that if any of the top squads were to suffer a slip, UMass would mind carrying home their medals.

"Our goal is to see if we can get into that fourth slot," said UMass coach Alfie Mitchell. "It would be nice to challenge for third and come away with some hardware."

Men's gymnastics aims at EIGLs

High bar tops for UMass

By GEORGE AUSTIN

The Minutemen will have to be on top of all their routines if they want to knock off undefeated Navy this weekend.

It has eluded them for 26 years. Not once has the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team been able to say, yes we are the best team in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League.

Two weeks ago, the Minutemen proved they were the best team in New England by winning the New England Championships despite being a little short handed. But that title was not the one that UMass has been looking forward to all year. This one is it, the EIGL Championships at Syracuse University this weekend.

The Minutemen come into this weekend at 6-1 in the EIGL, their only loss coming at the hands of the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md. UMass currently is holding second place, a meet behind the undefeated Midshipmen.

There are six other teams in this field, but the only one that really has a legitimate chance to overtake Navy and win the league championship is UMass. Right now though, Navy has to be considered the odds-on favorite with its team average of 270.35. The Minutemen average 263.16 but have been hitting high 260s the past couple of weeks. UMass coach Roy Johnson feels that the Minutemen might be catching Navy at the right time.

"Our focus is the EIGLs, our best performance," Johnson said. "Where as Navy is reaching for much more and if they don't have this meet in the correct perspective, we could catch them."

The reason that Johnson said that is because Navy has a shot at qualifying for the NCAA Championships this weekend but it needs to raise its score a few points. The Midshipmen are currently ranked 12th in the country by virtue of their average score. They need to raise that average a couple of points to catch Penn State, which is the No. 1 team in the Eastern Region. The No. 1 team in the East will qualify for the NCAA's in Nebraska.

Bar owners join to fight tax increase

By BETH GATELY

Collegian Correspondent

The 29 Amherst restaurant and bar owners who serve alcoholic beverages have joined together to protest a proposed liquor license fee increase.

The Committee for the Sale and Distribution of Alcoholic Beverages in the Town of Amherst, the official name the restaurant and bar owners have taken, strongly opposes a recent proposal by Administrative Assistant Nancy Board to the Amherst Select Board which would increase the fee from $600 to $5,000 for beer and wine, and from $2,500 to $5,000 for an all-alcohol license.

"The Director of Memberships of the Massachusetts Restaurant Association, Peter Christy has helped us organize. He gave us suggestions on how to approach the issue, he has been very helpful," said Chick Delano, owner of Delano's. Delano said Amherst has the highest fees in western Massachusetts and the second or third highest in the state. The license fees are currently 200-300 percent higher than surrounding towns, the committee said.

"It is an outrageously high price," said Paul D'entremont, a Delano's waiter. "A place like Classe' Cafe couldn't afford to pay $5,000 (for the liquor license)."

Committee members argue that if the proposal is passed, it would not only close many businesses, but would force those remaining in alcohol beverage sales business to "push" the sale of alcoholic beverage sales to cover the cost of the license. Delano said pushing sales runs contrary to the education and training that encourages "responsible drinking."

"I would have to increase food and drink prices to meet the high price tag on liquor licenses," Delano said.

Delano said the proposal does more for the surrounding towns than it does for Amherst. If the proposal is passed, it may be more feasible for people to travel to Northampton, Sunderland or Hadley to eat and drink, he said.

"If Northampton's prices are less expensive, why wouldn't people go there?" Delano said.

The restaurant and bar industry, the largest private sector employer in Amherst, generates millions in federal, state and local tax dollars for the town, he said.

"Amherst will lose jobs, tax revenue and money if the proposal is passed," he said.

"I think they are a bunch of gouging people over there [in Amherst]," said Bobby McGovern, owner of Packards in Northampton. "I don't think they should do it to them, they are being a tad greedy, placing such a burden on the restaurant owners."

The Amherst Select Board will vote on the proposal at the April 3 meeting.

Budget holdback to begin

Provost asks UMass deans for impact statements

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Provost Richard O'Brien last week announced that an operating budget holdback will go into effect and has asked for impact statements from all University of Massachusetts deans.

The University is asking for operating budget revisions from all schools and colleges to create a rainy-day fund to help offset any unfavorable budget decisions made at the state level, said Murray Schwartz, dean of the faculty of humanities and fine arts.

The exact percentage that each school and college will have to contribute has not been disclosed yet but Schwartz said the only place he can make any more cuts is from faculty and teaching assistant positions.

"I think we're really down to the bone now," he said.

The week before Spring Break O'Brien called a meeting to inform all University deans of a possible two percent budget holdback and asked each dean to prepare impact statements based on this figure.

Schwartz, in a meeting with humanities and fine arts department heads, said the only way to meet a two percent budget revision would be to cancel the search for a new French department chairman and to not rehire 66 teaching assistants, whose contracts are negotiated yearly.

"Those are the two things I'm really trying to avoid [but] I don't know if I can yet," Schwartz said.

If all 66 teaching assistants cannot be rehired for the fall of 1989 about 5000 course openings would not be available to students and may cause the writing program to be eliminated, Schwartz said.

Schwartz also told department heads that not hiring a new French department chairman would combine with the hiring freeze to render the French department ineffective.

Abortion to be debated tomorrow

Pro-choice or pro-life?

The question is the heart of a scheduled debate between two nationally known political activists. The abortion debate is scheduled for 8 p.m. tomorrow at the University of Massachusetts.

Judy Goldsmith, former president of the National Organization for Women, and Phyllis Schlafly, president of the Eagle Forum, will present their opposing views in the Student Union Ballroom.

Tickets are $2 and can be purchased in advance at the UMass Tix Office.

Goldsmith, of the National Center for Policy Alternatives, will argue the pro-choice position. As president of NOW, Goldsmith helped Geraldine Ferraro secure the 1984 democratic nomination for vice president.

Schlafly, a former advisor to the Reagan administration who has been called the pioneer of American conservatism, will argue against abortion. Named one of the ten most respected women in the world by Good Housekeeping, she has been credited with the defeat of the Equal Rights Amendment in the early 1970s.

If the event is sold out, viewing monitors will be set up in the Commonwealth room and the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union, according to the Distinguished Visitor's Program, sponsors of the event.

Smith to raise tuition

NORTHAMPTON - Smith College Trustees have approved a 9.5 percent increase in tuition, bringing the cost of attending the college to $18,440 per year.

Tuition at the school will be $13,270 for next year, room and board $5,170. Students are also charged an activity fee of approximately $110.

Rising salary costs and benefits for faculty and staff, financial aid, purchase of new books and equipment, and renovations were blamed for the increase.

The trustees have also increased the goal of a fundraising drive underway at the school by $26 million.

The school now seeks $152 million for new buildings and renovations, faculty salaries, and new equipment. The school has already raised $118.5 million in the 5-year campaign through gifts from alumni, parents, friends, foundations, and corporations.

Mary Maples Dunn, president of Smith, said the $118 million represents only 64 percent of the fundraising goals.

Videotape applications on the rise

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff
and The Associated Press

Charles Pickelhaupt considered using a Jell-O mold of his face to grab admissions officers' attention, but settled instead on a videotaped routine in which he sang, danced and touted his academic achievements.

He's convinced the 10-minute tape put him over the top and into the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's freshman class.

But to the increasing numbers of kids offering productions like Pickelhaupt's, admissions officials say: "Put those videos on hold."

"We don't get too many of those. It's more the private school, Ivy League mentality," said Timm Rinehart, admissions director at the University of Massachusetts. Rinehart said the University receives "four or five" videos a year.

"One student sent us a bag a microwave popcorn with his tape," he said, adding that the University does not encourage videos. "[Acceptance into UMass] invariably comes down to the high school transcript. The best videotape in the world doesn't make up for C's in high school," he said.

UMass will receive approximately 19,000 applications to fill 3,600 spots this year, he said, but the majority of those applying would not be aided by a video.

"If a student is interested in film, communication or art, then a tape may help," he said, "but if the tape is trying to convey personality, then it won't go too far."

Barbara Friend, assistant dean of admissions at Amherst College, said her office receives more homemade tapes every year.

"We appreciate the energy it takes to make one of these tapes, but it's gotten to the point where we just don't have the luxury of looking at them," said Friend. Amherst College receives about 4,500 applications annually for 400 spots in the freshman class, she said.

But teen-agers vying for acceptance at some of the nation's top colleges are producing videos with a vengeance, convinced that an innovative celluloid campaign could provide just the admissions boost they need.

Pickelhaupt said he hit on the video idea after a recruitment officer told him schools often give the edge to students whose applications stand out. And the engineering student said the scheme worked like a charm.

"Right after arriving here I was walking down the hall and a woman who saw my video stopped me and said, "You're Chuck Pickelhaupt, aren't you?"" the Gorham, Maine native said. "It definitely worked to my advantage."

Admissions officers at colleges throughout New England report the number of videos submitted this year by prospective students for the class of '93 in many cases doubled. However, these same officials say they've seen enough stand-up comedy routines, martial arts demonstrations, poetry readings, piano recitals and, in one case, beauty pageant finals.

"Just because someone has been in a school play doesn't mean we have to see the whole play. In fact, we'd prefer not to see it," Mance said.

But such practical considerations as time constraints and ennui are not the only reason they discourage video pitches, school officials said.

An MIT staff member evaluates all submitted videos, but Admissions Counselor Robert Weinerman said his office opposes the practice because it could be skewed against poorer applicants.

"[The] poorer kids don't have any access to the latest video equipment," Weinerman said. "That's the driving reason for our decision not to give videos much weight."

Health Center fights AIDS

By JEANNE BOLDUC
Collegian Staff

A student wakes up in fear. Safe sex, AIDS, problems, it's all a blur to the student who is scared and does not know where to turn.

Combatting that fear, and providing free and anonymous testing for the virus are two of the goals of the University of Massachusetts Health Center, according to a UMass Department of Public Health official.

"Testing is done using a numbered system to ensure anonymity," said Emily Fox, a UMass health education advisor. No names are disclosed throughout the process, she said.

AIDS, or acquired immune deficiency syndrome, is an affliction in which a virus attacks the body's immune system, leaving victims susceptible to a wide variety of infections and cancers. The Center for Disease Control statistics of Feb. 6, 1989 reported 85,590 cases of AIDS in the United States.

"Because the immune system is at a disadvantage, infections arise that someone with a healthy immune system would be able to fight off," said Debra Edelman, a health educator at UMass Health Center.

The percentage of positive results at the UMass testing site are low compared to the other 17 sites in Massachusetts, Fox said.

Only 10 percent of AIDS testing is done at testing sites, she said. "Some go to private physicians, the Red Cross, or find out through blood donations," Fox said.

Clients who inquire about the test at the Health Center are given the toll-free AIDS Hotline number for more information, she said.

"All the tests in the world will not stop the spread of the virus, but safer sex and needle practices will stop the spread significantly," she said.

Clients are counseled on what the test results mean before the blood test is done, said Fox.

A person who tests positive may not show symptoms of the virus for 10 years, Fox said. A positive test indicates the presence of AIDS antibodies. The person who tests positive has been exposed to the AIDS virus, but does not necessarily have AIDS, Fox said.

"Symptoms may arise sooner, later, or never," she said.

■ budget holdback to begin

"What we're doing is reacting to legislative moves right now. And the provost is asking prudent questions," said Charles Moran, director of the writing program.

"So what's happening now is people are looking at things in the subjective which doesn't mean they can't become real," he said.

Moran said that the constant budget cuts and revisions has the cumulative effect of destabilizing of the University.

"As we can't recruit top-flight faculty, fewer and fewer top flight graduate students will come here. As we lose faculty strength the calibre of our graduate students starts to drop," he said.

Schwartz said that an effect that has already become evident is declining morale among faculty and the loss of good people to other institutions.

He also said that UMass is the only major research school in the state public higher educational system but legislators do not seem to realize that.

"Right now, this campus is not recognized for the special campus that it is," he said.

Telefund struggles to meet goal

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Telefund workers at the University of Massachusetts have barely three months left to raise more than $400,000 in contributions from alumni and parents to meet this year's goal of $1.7 million, the director said.

The telefund, which was established in 1983, netted $1.2 million in contributions last year and is attempting to boost its nearly $1.3 million total by deadline June 30, the end of fiscal year 1988, Telefund Director Tina Miller said.

"We're down to the wire," Miller said of the Memorial Hall-based operation. "We have to have that money in."

Money accumulated by the program is dispersed to various University departments and has been used in the past to assist the UMass Minuteman Marching Band, scholarship funding, and to purchase library materials, Miller said.

Assistant Director Sharon Borer said nearly 100 students work seven days a week to request pledges, and about 450 people offer contributions daily. Telefund callers are instructed to first request a $1,000 donation, but Borer said the average gift is $70.

"We need to set their expectations," she said. "You never know what some people can give unless you ask."

But Borer said no limit is placed on donations, and any contributions are readily accepted.

"We will take any amount someone wants to give us," she said.

Although the University will receive less than 50 percent in state funding this year because of budget cuts, Borer said the current turmoil is not included in their attempts to increase pledges.

"We don't use the budget deficit as a reason to give," she said. "We want people to give because they believe in public higher education."

Miller said the students are the thrust behind the operation's success and added that the program is "very competitive" and professionally run.

"I think it's phenomenal; they're working very hard," she said of student efforts.

Telefund staffers are cautiously optimistic about meeting their goal and are gearing up for the intensity of the next few months, Miller said.

"We should be able to do it," she said. "The students are really feeling a true commitment to it."

Move your floor to the pond

Craig Vater

As students, we understand that we all have pressures and commitments; time is a valuable commodity. It is understandable that people are skeptical about taking time to do something about this crisis, especially when it is so difficult to be sure that our time will be well spent. For example, "Cutback City," a potentially powerful method of protest, has not been as effective as it could be. A lot of people feel that another body in a shack isn't going to make much of a difference. Yet, with just seven shacks and a handful of people, "Cutback City" made state-wide news.

Now, imagine if there were two or three hundred shacks and over a thousand people pond-side. Would that make national news? There's no doubt; the media would eat it up. This might seem a bit unrealistic at first, but there are over forty residence halls on campus — that's more than three hundred floors. What if the people living on these floors decided to get together? If each floor decided to build and staff one shack there would barely be room to fit them all. Think of the power of the massage that we would be sending out.

The beauty of the plan is that the time commitment would be so small compared to the impact made. We know this from our own experience. On the Sunday before Spring Break, a group of fifteen residents and R.A.'s from Grayson/Field cluster built three new shacks in just two and a half hours. It's easy, and we had a good time.

Staffing a shack would be even easier. If a floor of twenty five decided to build a shack, that would mean staying there with another floor member only once every two weeks. Now that Spring is here and the weather is warming up, a night camping out will be bearable, probably even enjoyable.

So, your saying to yourself — "sure, it sounds like a good idea if everyone really does it, but will they?" People have already begun. If you are an R.A., you will be receiving a letter outlining the plan in detail at either your R.A. class tonight or at your staff meeting this week. We are trying to network through R.A.'s because it's a fast and easy way of communicating with every floor on campus.

TV in highschool offers benefits too

I am writing in response to Meredith O'Brien's article condemning the new Channel One television station which has recently been installed in several high schools across the country. In her article, Ms. O'Brien reiterates the standard complaint against Channel One — it subjects students to two minutes of commercials within each ten-minute news broadcast. Unfortunately, Ms. O'Brien has chosen to ignore the many benefits which this program brings.

I am sure that I do not have to remind anyone about the financial problems plaguing our high schools. By participating in the Channel One program, schools receive thousands of dollars worth of computer and video equitpment, which they may use in whatever capacity they choose. This would include science and math classes, whose quality Ms. O'Brien laments in her article. In our school systems, where the archaic ditto machine still reigns supreme because of the higher costs associated with Xeroxing, thousands of dollars worth of free equipment is nothing to be sneezed at.

In addition, we cannot ignore the fact that most young people today are extremely video-oriented. Many schools, including this University, are now implementing programs which use telecasts from foreign nations to teach foreign language and culture. Not surprisingly, commercials are used very, very often in such innovative programs because they are short, snappy and easily remembered. Some of these commercials promote American products, but I have yet to hear any complaints about them; people have rightly surmised that the pros of using the commercials outweigh the cons. If Ms. O'Brien still objects to the Channel One commercials, however, let me remind her that the average adolescent watches hours of television a day outside of school and has not doubt developed some immunity to mindless advertisements. Finally, even if a few students are not immune, one of the commercials shown on the first day of the Channel One Program was an anti-drug commercial, to which we should all hope students watching paid heed.

Thus, far from acting as a deterrent to cultural literacy, Channel One's homeroom period broadcasts seem to offer a unique opportunity to promote it. Has Ms. O'Brien been in a high school during homeroom lately? Announcements of what is for lunch do not enhance anybody's cultural literacy, but perhaps some catchy news video on Channel One might lead to a discussion which will. So let us get down off our high horses and stop harping on Channel One's 120 seconds of commercials when instead we could be using our energy to invent ways to make the program as valuable an experience as possible for all involved.

Peter Pan doesn't fly to Amherst

Alise Harfield

The words Peter Pan used to conjure images of Sandy Duncan in a green body suit, gliding across a decorated stage, all the while hanging from a thread. I was so proud of the fact that I was the only intelligent kid who realized she wasn't really flying at all.

Those were the days.

Now, when I see those oversized green letters written on the bus that I rely on to take me from Boston to Amherst, I discover that I'm not as intelligent as I thought. If I were, I wouldn't count on Peter Pan at all.

Perhaps I'm being harsh.

It was four o'clock. I called the Peter Pan busline to find out what time the buses ran to UMass on Saturday. I was greeted by a grumpy woman who was obviously convinced that a schedule was already in front of me and I was taunting her for privileged information. Long distance.

She gave me a semblance of departure times, none of which followed any pattern, and hung up without saying good-bye. Maybe she was mad that I asked about the express bus that takes two, not three hours to go to Amherst. Apparently none were running that day.

She assured both my mom and me that all buses were direct to Haigis Mall. I didn't have to walk far to my dorm.

Having decided on a 6:15 bus, my parents and I left in plenty of time to arrive at South Station and get behind some 30 others with the same destination. After waving like a hypnotized hen to my parents. Barely a moment had passed when my dad told me the bus would be direct to Springfield, not UMass.

"Did you know this?" he asked.

Not really, but the manager of the station did well in informing us — with his loud, impatient voice — that every bus to Amherst is direct to Springfield, then Amherst.

Thanks for telling us.

Peace? No. Another worthy interruption? Yes. The bus driver stood at her bow and proceeded to yell the rules at us. She must have been trained by the manager.

"There is to be no smoking on this here coach. If I catch anyone smoking, we'll pull over, without warning, and wait for the first state trooper to take you off this bus. This is your only warning," she said. "NO Smoking in the Restrooms! Don't even try it, kid, 'cuz I can smell it!"

Well, 8 p.m. came and went without ceremony, as the 25 of us filed into the Springfield terminal. I panicked slightly, not knowing where the Amherst gate would be.

I found the bus driver and asked her. She smiled, and referred me to Scott, in the glass booth above. He, too, smiled. Then I knew it wasn't an about-face of manners. He told me the next bus to Amherst was at 9:15, not 8:15, and it would arrive after 10. When I told him Boston told us otherwise, he proceeded to run the gamut of swears that begin with F and S, stopping only to call Boston, swear at them, laugh some more, and shut his glass cage in my face. The 25 of us were left wondering what was going on.

After a half hour, he opened his cage and announced a bus to Amherst "to take all 25 of you" would be leaving soon.

Hallelujah.

No apology. No explanation. No wonder he's kept in a cage.

"Hey, do any of you know how to get to Northampton and Amherst? I dunno. I'm the Worcester driver," she said. Then, when we greeted her with silence, she added, "I'm not kidding, ya know."

Neither am I. We reached Amherst just after 10. Some nice passenger gave her directions. Lucky us.

If only I could fly on a string to UMass. Just like Sandy Duncan would.

Alise Harfield is a Collegian columnist, and thankful to be alive and well in Amherst

More from the strange world of Bone Cow Nation

By JASON TALERMAN
Collegian Staff

I was gonna lead with a quote from Framton Comes Alive but then my head cleared and light started to find its way into the back of my eyeballs. I'm still a little woozy so bear with me. The night staff here at the Collegian are used to occassional problems with my equillibrium so the alarms need not be sounded. The quote wasn't strickly Frampton. It was his guitar via some ridiculous device that all kinds of freaks in the late 70's bought out of the classifieds in Circus magazine. I swear to the improbable almighty above though, I saw a fourteen year old dust fiend in the Noho Grampy's wearing just such a contraption. At first I thought it was a retainer but then I heard the hum. As he came up through the Ring Dings aisle past me to the register things became clear, "Do you, you, feel like I do."

My untimely suicide was barely avoided this weekend. Only the radio part of my parent's stereo was working and teh pickings were pretty slim. I settled on the Classic Hits 100.7 but I wasn't happy about it. Seven straight days of home repair with at least one song from Chicago 13 every half hour. If it wasn't for my unparalelled success in the eleven or twelve NCAA pools that I entered I would have cranked up the gas for sure. Right now I have a virtual lock on some heavy cash rewards and if Illinois advances any further the organizers of the pool might have to employ the crush rule. I was still a little groggy from Frampton, Chicago, and the rest of the 70's when the Hoyas fell to Duke yesterday afternoon. All the homeless dudes that slum by the TV downstairs in the campus center started to gather their belongings when I went into that epileptic-styled victory dance that I reserve only for such occassions. I hope John Thompson's tickets back to D.C. were on Eastern so that his death march back to Georgetown is rerouted through every major airport in the continent. The prolonged misery of coach Thompson is the one beam of light in a week that was otherwise a giant stain on the sheets that are my life.

With the exit of the Hoyas I have now placed three teams in Seattle. If the UNLV frontcourt hadn't been blinded by the sequins of their tumbling squad I would be four for four. There are rumors out there about my lack of scruples but came April third, when I collect, I'm goona open up some wounds and pour in the salt. Yessiree, I am riding high; good times ahead. I shall put the terror that is nostalgia based FM radio behind me.

The major problem that I have with these stations is that they play just enough Neil Young songs to keep me tuned in. It is a losing proposition though. Ten minutes of Cowgirl in the Sand is no match for continuous ELO rock blocks. I spent the bulk of last Thursday afternoon damaging vertebrea while replastering the livingroom ceiling and I definitely heard three quarters of the entire Eagles discography including the solo projects.

My theory is as follows. These stations exist for mainly so that clerks at True Value hardware stores can request slow Rod Stewart songs for their ex-wives. The wives fail to listen though. They are busy, doubling their alimony payments by doing telephone surveys at home.

Laconic Lyle turns on the style at Smith College

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

Lyle Lovett
John M. Greene Hall, Smith College.
May 16

The crowd which had gathered in the John M. Greene Hall to see Lyle Lovett unveil his Large Band, reminded me of the faces you associate with district schools music festivals, mostly bearded baby-boomers dragging their unruly five-year-olds, who probably didn't know the difference between country music and country pancakes, behind them. If there were any students present, it was probably only a few Smithies, and most of them already look like their parents.

As a guy from RSI, yet another sixties casualty with facial growth and a plaid shirt, came on stage to announce Leo Kottke, it seemed to me that there was a definite tone emerging here, that both felt and smelt like faded brown corduoroy.

I was relieved to find Kottke clean shaven. Attired in a light blue V-neck sweater, he grinned like someone who had just completed a particularly satisfying round of golf. His right hand hardly seemed to move across the guitar strings which chimed in dazzling, dizzying rounds of cross-weaving melody and harmony. Technique seemed too ugly a word.

And when he finally opened his mouth, the breaks were just as good as the takes. The multi-talented Kottke's wry wit turned out to be just as sharp as his playing, and just as quirky.

I've often thought that there is some strange kind of similarity between baroque and country: they seem to share the same sense of solemn pride and dignity. It was the long dark figure of cellist John Hagen pouring out a baroque improvisation and spiking it with a twist of blues (now that is sass!) who set the scene for the Lovett show.

Predictably enough, Lovett wasn't on stage for the first number, 'The Blues Walk' which is, after all, basically a showcase for the band, as well as a great intro for Lyle to come waltzing onto the stage, but somehow it just didn't click, didn't swing. It was too early in the night and the band were still sluggish. They seemed to be lagging behind the groove in one bar, only to race on ahead of it in the next.

But after the somewhat frenzied opening, things settled down. Lovett was his usual cool, eloquently inarticulate self and his presence was nicely off-balanced by the dynamic Francine Evans whose powerful set of tonsils sometimes threatened to swallow him whole, in numbers like 'What Do You Do' and 'M.O.N.E.Y.' But I found the jazz and blues stuff left me strangely cold when compared with the brilliant heart-wrenching country ballads, songs like 'Closing Time,' 'If I Were the Man You Wanted' and 'Walk Through the Bottomlands,' of which I found there to be a distinct lack in this show (the Hagen effect again).

For the most part Lovett kept the two sides of his personality separate, but at one point, in a piece of free-form improvisation worthy of John Zorn, Hagen's cello was allowed to rub against the baritone sax of Andy Laster, and the sparks flew.

In the end, Lovett's performance, though excellent, was neither as moving nor as uplifting as the one Nanci Griffith gave when I saw her last year in Glasgow, but it was, I reflected as I stepped out of the building into the Northampton night air, exceptionally cool.

Historic companies spiritual leader will rebuild from ashes

By Richard Sasson
The Patriot Ledger

WESTWOOD — Dominic Marinelli of Walpole, president of the 92-year-old Norfolk Golf Club on East Street, vowed yesterday to rebuild the clubhouse that was destroyed in a $100,000, three-alarm fire over the weekend.

Marinelli said the golf course will reopen in a couple of days and the clubhouse will be rebuilt.

"It's a disappointment," he said. "The building has been there a lot of years and there's a lot of history to it. But we'll come out of it. The club will survive like it has in the past."

No members were in the club during the fire, which started near the club's function room at 8 a.m. yesterday, leaving only the shop and a section of the locker room standing, John J. Sheehy said.

By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Powerful emotions could erupt in a business or personal relationship. Use a conservative approach to fend off confrontation. Your finances get a huge boost from events at a distance.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Work goes smoothly, but your domestic life will require firmer control. Enlist help from mate, family members. If you cannot always please a partner, please yourself. Your instincts are excellent.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Be sure to see a job through to completion. An authority figure will be impressed. A raise or promotion is inevitable. Romance will require careful nurturing. Offer a sympathetic shoulder.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) You are learning the value of practicality. Project a more conservative attitude and you will win big in business circles. Your career could lose momentum if you switch romantic partners now.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) You can imprint your style if you use a laid-back approach. The competition will not guess your game plan. Acquiring high-tech skills will improve your chances for career advancement.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) An emotional exchange surprises but pleases you. Once the truth is out, you achieve a new level of communication. Success comes through overseas contacts. Proceed slowly in romance. Know your own heart.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Mate or business partner appreciates your dedication, diplomacy and newly acquired patience. Together, you face current challenges. Although love has its ups and downs, you are entering a very happy period.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Continued success will be good for you, building your self-confidence. Find a good place to live and work. A loss can be amusing, depending on your perspective. Take setbacks in stride.

SAGITARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Travel could bring you new position or power. Be alert to any unusual events; they could help you decide on an important course of action. Mate is supportive. Show your deep appreciation.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) See what you can do to make your days more productive. Try something new and do not be afraid to take small risks. Romance can be free, without commitment now.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Step back and re-orient yourself before pressing on. You finally come to grips with an important personal problem. Long-lost romantic attractions capture your attention. A new partnership is possible.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) You may feel like remaining incommunicado. The unusual information you acquire today may not have a practical use. Stop daydreaming and take action! Straighten out a misunderstanding without further delay.

But then in the nightcap — yeah, that's three games in one day — the UMass defense found some solid footing, holding Cal-Berkeley scoreless through 4 innings, before yielding 3-0. Arizona knocked UMass into the consolation bracket with a 4-0 loss the next morning, from where the Minutewomen topped Oklahoma 3-2 for their first win of the spring.

Freshman Aprile broke the ice in the fifth inning, tagging all four bases after attracting a pair of wild throws while bunting in a run from second base. Oklahoma tied the score in the sixth before the Minutewomen pulled it out before the wire.

UMass then left Sunnyvale to face Fresno State. Before 1500 fans and cable TV cameras, UMass frightened their hosts through six scoreless innings — anchored primarily by the defensive heroics of Alison Forman at third base — before suffering through a seven-run seventh. The second game of the doubleheader saw UMass again fall short, 2-0.

"We had them sweating," described Sortino. "It was more than a respectable showing."

After dropping a game to Utah State last Wednesday, the Minutewomen split consecutive doubleheaders against Santa Clara and San Jose State to finish 3-10. And while the team defense and organization continued to improve with each outing, the bats began to awaken a bit toward week's end as well.

Senior slugger Barbara Meehan pounded her first home run of the year against San Jose, and Forman chipped in a couple of doubles just before boarding the return flight home.

Sortino also got a taste of what to expect as things unfold this spring defensively, as Mary Duff and Jennifer Miller joined Forman and Bonnie Schilling on the roll call for high praise.

"Defensively we're a lot better than we were 10 days ago. I feel real positive about it," said Sortino. "I don't think they could have matured any more quickly, every single inning was a test. We matured three years in ten days."

The team will now take a couple of days rest, reset their watches and heal a slew of bumps and bruises accumulated on the Pacific coast, before heading back into tournament play this weekend at the University of Connecticut.

Illini make reservations for Seattle

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — Nick Anderson scored 27 points and Kenny Battle 25 as No. 3 Illinois overcame a 13-point deficit and defeated No. 7 Syracuse 89-86 yesterday, advancing to to NCAA Final Four for the first time in 37 years.

Illinois, 31-4, shed its label as a postseason flop with its victory in the Midwest Regional title game and will play Big Ten Conference rival Michigan in the national semifinals at Seattle next Saturday.

Michigan, which lost to Illinois twice during the regular season, by 12 and 16 points, routed Virginia 102-65 in the Southeast Regional final Saturday.

Anderson scored five points in a 7-2 run that broke the final tie of the game and put Illinois ahead to stay in the final 6½ minutes.

Kendall Gill scored 18 points for Illinois, which denied Syracuse its second Final Four trip in three years. Freshman Billy Owens scored 22 points for Syracuse, 30-8. Derrick Coleman and Stephen Thompson scored 17 points each and Sherman Douglas 15.

Anderson, a 6-foot-5 junior, grabbed an offensive rebound and dropped in a shot, giving the Illini a 72-70 lead, and Gill nailed a pull-up jumper at the free throw line, making it 74-70 with 5:38 left.

After Coleman's layup brought Syracuse within two, Anderson sank a free throw, then scored on another offensive rebound for a 77-72 Illinois lead with 5:06 remaining.

Syracuse came within 79-78 on five straight points by Owens, the last a spinning bank shot with 3:09 remaining. But Battle scored on an alley oop pass from reserve Larry Smith and Gill came down the lane to dunk the ball after an offensive rebound, making it 83-78 with 2:30 to play and Illinois held on.

The Orangemen closed to 87-86 on Douglas' three-pointer with 23 seconds left, his only basket of the second half. Syracuse fouled Marcus Liberty, who missed the front end of a one-and-one with 20 seconds to go, but Gill got the rebound and passed to Battle, who made two free throws with 15 seconds to go.

The victory came in difficult circumstances for Illinois. Battle played only 13 minutes and scored just four points in an 83-69 semifinal victory over Louisville on Friday night because of a bruised knee suffered in practice Thursday.

Center Lowell Hamilton, Illinois' tallest starter at 6-foot-7, sprained his right ankle in the Louisville game and was hampered Sunday. And Smith was playing while his mother was hospitalized with a stroke suffered Friday.

Illinois recovered froma 14-0 burst that gave Syracuse a 12-point first half lead to tie the score less than 4½ minutes into the second half.

With Syracuse leading 37-25, Illinois went on an 8-0 run that Smith capped with two baskets, cutting the lead to 37-33 wih 3:51 left in the half Georgetown coach John Thompson shows justifiable concern as his team was about to be eliminated from the NCAA tourney by Duke yesterday, 85-77.

No. 2 Georgetown be-Deviled, 85-77

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) — Christian Laettner won the battle of freshman centers, hitting nine of his first 10 shots on the way to scoring 24 points and leading Duke into its third NCAA Final Four in four years with an 85-77 victory over Georgetown in the East Regional final yesterday.

Georgetown's Alonzo Mourning, the 6-foot-10 freshman who almost made the U.S. Olympic team last summer, was limited to 11 points and spent the last five minutes of the game sitting on the bench.

The win by the Blue Devils, 28-7, prevented a Final Four made up of two teams each from the Big East and Big Ten conferences. Duke advances to Seattle for a national semifinal matchup with Seton Hall, which beat Nevada-Las Vegas 84-61 Saturday. Illinois and Michigan of the Big Ten meet in the other semifinal.

Georgetown, 29-5, failed in its attempt to get back to Seattle for a repeat of its 1984 national championship there.

Duke, 6-0 in NCAA East Regional games played at the Meadowlands, used three 8-0 spurts in the first 13 minutes of the second half to take a 68-56 lead, and a three-point play by the 6-foot-10 Laettner expanded the margin to 75-61 with 5:41 remaining.

The Hoyas refused to fold, however, scoring the next 12 points and grabbing three of their own missed free throws in the process.

No fun in the sun for softball

Minutewomen go 3-10 in California, but team is enthusiastic

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Try and describe what it felt like, coach, having not yet played a real game -- or, for that matter, practiced on real grass -- and up against three softball teams ranked in the top 20 in the country, all on the first day of the season, in the Budlite tournament in Sunnyvale, CA?

"We felt like the cone heads," said University of Massachusetts softball head coach Elaine Sortino. "We played scared, timid, young and tight."

Well, it's to be understood . . . and was quickly overcome. Up against the top talent in the country (including a double date with Fresno State, the No.1 ranked softball team in the nation), UMass kicked off the spring campaign with an educational 3-10 swing through California last week. UMass suffered through spells of spotty defensive play, and they struggled to string hits together (seven of the losses were of the shutout variety). But, scheduling the best first, the purpose of the road trip was to cram a lot of quality playing time and effort into this year's young UMass squad, and to that end, the mission was well accomplished along the way, according to Sortino.

"We've got some hole to climb out of, but I think we can turn it around. We'll be a lot better in the end because of what we went through in the beginning," she said.

"With every game we felt better and better about ourselves. I am really enthusiastic; we have a very clear understanding of who we are as a team now, and we know that we're going to have to play hard as a team every game for us to win."

UMass didn't really have a choice. Opening day found the Minutewomen staring Indiana, New Mexico and California-Berkeley square in the face. All three squads had already put in two weeks worth of regular season road work, and have cemented themselves in the top 20.

UMass dropped the opener 8-0, as the entire pitching staff combined to allow 12 walks. Holly Aprile threw six more walks at the University of New Mexico in the second game of the afternoon, a 5-0 loss.

Gymnastics team fourth in A-10 meet

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The goals were lofty but clear: do well and serve notice that the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics program is both upping and coming.

At last weekend's season-ending Atlantic 10 conference meet, and the visit to Temple (with guest Northeastern University) that followed, the Minutewomen (9-2) successfully turned the heads of the traditional elite.

UMass finished fourth at the A-10's, posting 180.95 points, then scored a 178.90 at Temple. The Minutewomen had entered these final two meets of this regular season's schedule with an outside shot of landing their first bid to the post-season regional meet, but failed to gain the necessary ground.

Penn State captured the A-10 title for the seventh consecutive season with a 186.85, followed by West Virginia (185.53) and Temple (184.30). The Minutewomen finished ahead of host George Washington, Rhode Island and Rutgers.

"I couldn't ask for anything else," said UMass head coach Alfie Mitchell of his team's showing. "For them to go down there and do that, I was happy."

The Minutewomen entered the A-10's as the fifth-ranked team in the conference, and had never finished as high as fourth. Next year's tournament is scheduled to be staged in the UMass' own Boyden Gym.

Individually, freshman Erika Baxter scored the sixth-best all around score of the meet at 36.95. She also finished third in the uneven bars (9.50), and balance beam (9.45). Teammate Kim Grady turned in the third best floor exercise, scored as a 9.35. Debbie Schultz was chosen before the meet as an all-conference competitor in the uneven bars.

At Temple the following Saturday, Baxter tied the Owl's Sandra Mitchell for top all around honors with a 36.35, followed by Grady's 36.25.

Baseball team finishes 5-5 during Spring Break

By JOE ROBERTS
Collegian Correspondent

DELAND, Fla. -- The University of Massachusetts baseball team finished its 11-game Florida trip with a 5-5 record. (The Italy game doesn't count and if you saw it you'd understand). The Minutemen won their last three games, surrendering only six earned runs as their pitching staff came together.

Leading this new rotation on the trip were Brian Conroy and Paul Ciaglo. Ciaglo (2-0), a transfer from Springfield College had 28 strikeouts in his 16 innings pitched. He had two complete game wins (St. Xavier 3-2, and Iowa 5-4), and his victory over Iowa allowed the Minutemen to gain revenge over a tough Hawkeye team that had won seven in a row, including twice against UMass.

Conroy (1-1), a Northeastern transfer, pitched a three-hitter versus Montclair State, a Division III powerhouse. Conroy had a shutout through eight innings before an unearned run ended an otherwise impressive outing. In 16 innings, he allowed only two earned runs for an ERA of 1.13.

"Conroy and Ciaglo pitched extremely well," said UMass coach Mike Stone. "They each had two great outings. Don Strange and (Dave) Telgheder each had a good outing. Telgheder came back after a rough start. Strange had a good start but then had some problems in his second. Rich Graham pitched well as a freshman," said Stone.

"We're going to get good pitching, hopefully we can get enough offense to take advantage of it. I thought we would hit better but we'll have too wait and see."

Offensively, UMass was led by seniors Mike Chambers and Drew Seccafico. Seccafico (12-38, .351) started the season with a four-hit game versus the University of Iowa. He doubled, and had a three-run home run in a game the Minutemen lost 11-8. Seccafico leads UM with 10 RBI.

Chambers did the opposite, ending his spring break with a three-hit game versus Montclair State. His average stands at .400 (10-25).

Drew Comeau put himself in the UMass record book with a solo home run versus St. Xavier. The blast gave him 23 career home runs, more than any other Minutemen, and he is still a junior. Comeau later homered aginst Montclair State in UM's 5-1 win versus the Indians.

Freshman Brian Bright (9-28, .321) made a brilliant debut for the Minutemen. In his first collegiate at-bat he walked with the bases loaded to tie up the Iowa game, and his first two hits were home runs.

"He has really swung the bat well and his defense has come around," said Stone.

Freshman Glenn DiSarcina picked up where his brother Gary left off. In his first at-bat, he had an RBI double.

Unfortunately, DiSarcina's partner in UM's keystone combination was seriously injured in the last game of the trip. Freshman Dan Biagini dove for a popup behind first base and landed on the ball. When he landed, Biagini ruptured his spleen. He underwent successful surgery on his spleen Saturday night and will remain in the hospital for seven to 10 days in Florida. At this time, the possibility of his return this season is unknown.

"Biagini did a great job at second base. He helped turn just about every double-play we could. We'll have to regroup as a team and possibly shuffle people around to positions they haven't played at," Stone said.

The men's lacrosse team had a sunny trip to California, winning its first three games by a combined score of 82-14.

In other Spring Break action . . .

Due to deadline constraints, details were not available for the Spring Break action of several teams.

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team kicked off its season in highest gear, traveling to sunny California and rolling over a trio of teams.

Last Sunday, the Gorillas overpowered the University of California-Davis to the tune of 32-5. Later in the week, UMass rolled up a 25-6 win over Sonoma State and a 25-3 drubbing over UCal-Berkeley.

The Gorillas open their home season Wednesday afternoon when they face last year's NCAA runner-up, Cornell University, at the Hill.

The women's lacrosse team didn't stray as far away, and didn't have as much success as the men. After opening the season with a win over Hofstra, the Gazelles dropped consecutive games to Loyola of Baltimore and the University of Maryland to finish at 1-2.

The Gazelles will host Yale Wednesday in their home opener at Totman Field.

The men's gymnastics team competed in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League meet at Syracuse University on Mar. 18. Details from this meet weren't available at press time.

In other action this week, the baseball team opens its season against Connecticut tomorrow at Lorden Field, and the men's and women's tennis teams will host the University of Hawaii Friday on the Upper Boyden Courts.

Anti-anthrax fight reaches selectmen

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Local activists last night asked the Amherst Board of Selectmen to make the town a "biological warfare research-free zone."

"Anthrax research at the University of Massachusetts violates a treaty the United States signed at the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention," said Frances Crowe, representing the American Friends Service Committee of Western Massachusetts.

The AFSC presented a petition with 25 signatures to the selectboard, calling for the ban on some research.

University officials have maintained that the research is safe and ethical, since it employs a non-infectious form of the Bacillus anthrecus bacterium.

The UMass research is funded by the U.S. Army Biological Defense Research Program. Opponents claim this violates the spirit of the 1972 treaty, even though the research is aimed at finding a better vaccine for the infectious anthrax disease.

"The treaty prohibits the production, deployment, testing and offensive research of biological agents for warfare purposes," Crowe said. It was signed by more than 100 nations at the convention, according to Crowe.

Cristobal Bonifaz, the attorney representing the committee said, "awareness of the extreme danger of biological warfare is what prompted the treaty."

Crowe said citizens should take control of society. "We are not willing to have the treaty broken to have a weapon of this type in our community."

"Although UMass is following safe guidelines, there is always the danger of an accident. I don't think there's high security at UMass. Someone could just walk in the lab off the street," Crowe said.

Selectboard members expressed concern about the consequences of ending the research at UMass. Chairwoman Edith Wilkinson asked if UMass would have legal ground to sue Amherst if the research was stopped.

"It is certainly a possibility that Umass could turn around and sue, but from a legal standpoint, they wouldn't have a chance," said Bonifaz. "UMass won't sue."

"I feel it's bad to take an anti-education stance by prohibiting research in an academic institution," said Selectman Richard Torrey.

Crowe said she believes an academic institution should conduct research in more "useful" areas instead of agents that kill people. "The university should be doing more AIDS research. It should make sure all children have measles vaccinations in place of working with vaccinations for anthrax that would allow the use of anthrax bombs," she said.

There are 129 universities conducting "hidden" anthrax research, according to Crowe. She said she plans to challenge them "one by one."

The Board of Selectmen will vote in May to decide if it is in favor of making Amherst a Biological Warfare Research-Free Zone.

UMass and Japanese business officials celebrate new co-op agreement.

By RICK SASSON
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts will be placed in paid business jobs in Japan under a recent agreement between the school and a Japanese employee placement firm.

The UMass Cooperative Education Program on March 13 joined forces with Selnate, the Japanese firm based in Tokyo, paving the way to send at least 15 students to the country this summer. Officials say the program has the potential to host as many as 100 students each year.

Cooperative education, where students are paid to work in their field as an alternative to academic credit, is flourishing in the United States. But the idea is still fresh in Japan, said Joan Stoia, director of the co-op program.

"As far as we know, this is the only program of its kind," Stoia said.

University students have worked in Japan in the past, but the placement process had been too expensive and time-consuming, Stoia said. Selnate will act as a clearinghouse for Japanese businesses, easing the the problem of contacting individual companies, she said.

Larry Rosenberg of the UMass International Programs office said the Japanese need university students to help them internationalize their businesses. In some cases, he said, students would assist employees with their English. Others might be placed in an English-

Japanese program fights to meet need

While a new program at the University of Massachusetts will send students to Japan for cooperative education jobs, the Japanese department faces a road of recovery to prepare interested students.

Since the department lost four full-time faculty members last fall, enrollment for first-year Japanese has decreased by between 30 and 40 students, according to Donald Gjertson, chairman of the Asian studies department. Using lectures and part-timers, the department now has the equivalent of three full-time professors.

For students interested in working in Japan, cooperative education director Joan Stoia said some proficiency in Japanese is necessary. "Our best guess is that four courses would allow you to survive," she

Journalism controversy hits town

By RICK SASSON

Joe McGinniss, author of Blind Faith and Fatal Vision, is among a dozen prominent writers scheduled to attend a non-fiction conference at the University of Massachusetts next week.

McGinniss was the center of criticism in a recent two-part essay in the The New Yorker that has touched off debate in the literary world about the journalist's relationship with a subject.

New Yorker staff writer Janet Malcom contends in her series that journalists make their living by gaining the trust of subjects and then betraying them at any cost. She illustrates her case with McGinniss' 1983 best seller Fatal Vision.

McGinniss' novel is the story of Jeffery MacDonald, an Army doctor who in 1979 was convicted of brutally murdering his pregnant wife and two children. He has strenuously denied the charges.

Throughout his trial, the journalist lived with and befriended MacDonald to gain insight about his life. MacDonald agreed to cooperate for the book -- believing that it would bring attention to his innocence and raise money for his defense.

But when Fatal Vision was published in 1983, MacDonald sued McGinniss from prison for $15 million, charging fraud and breech of contract. MacDonald contended, and is supported by Malcom, that McGinniss deceived him into thinking the book was from MacDonald's point of view, and then portraying him as a monster.

MacDonald's suit against McGinnis ended in a mistrial, but McGinniss later settled out of court for $325,000.

Norman Sims, chairman of the UMass journalism department, said writer-subject relationships will

W. Virginia House considering ousting state treasurer

CHARLESTON, W. Va. (AP) — The state House Judiciary Committee yesterday sent to the full House articles of impeachment against Treasurer A. James Manchin stemming from losses of $279 million in a fund under Manchin's control in 1987.

The committee voted 17-7 to recommend the impeachment after adding two additional articles to the 16 it voted for last Wednesday.

The popular, flamboyant Manchin, 61, is in his second term as state treasurer. He is a Democrat, and his party also controls the House of Delegates and state Senate.

House Speaker Chuck Chambers said the body could vote on impeachment as early as tomorrow. If it passes the House, the case would then go to the Senate for a trial.

Senate President Larry Tucker, anticipating that a majority of the House will vote to impeach Manchin, has told his colleagues to be prepared to hear the case in May and estimated the trial would take three to four weeks.

The last time a West Virginia treasurer was impeached and removed from office was in 1876.

Also today, the House Judiciary Committee then voted 22-3 to censure state Auditor Glen Gainer for his role in the losses.

The articles recomnend that Manchin be impeached for maladministration, incompetence, neglect of duty, high crimes and misdemeanors for his role in the investment fund losses and for conspiring to cover them up.

Protesters welcome new faces

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Balmy breezes and continued resolve were cited as reasons for a predicted surge of budget cut protesters living in "Cutback City," residents said yesterday.

"Cutback City," the home for 20 people in 11 ramshackle huts on the banks of the campus pond, was erected more than a month ago by "Students for a Democratic University" to protest state budget cutbacks to public higher education.

John Farrar, a "city" founder and one of three students who lived in the huts during spring break, said he hopes warm weather will prompt more students to camp out.

"We intend to turn it into Amherst's newest night spot," he said, adding that his stay during spring break was "nice" with the exception of Friday's snowstorm.

Al Arpad, a former student trustee candidate and resident of the "city," said two new residents arrived yesterday afternoon.

"We've been disorganized. People come down and we don't have sleeping bags and then we lose them," he said, adding that residents will begin providing sleeping bags to interested students every night, starting tonight.

Carolyn Conrad, who has spent nearly three weeks in the huts, said she was not surprised by the low turnout of students during spring break and spoke optimistically of the weeks ahead.

"I can't imagine that we won't at least double [the population] this week," she said. "A lot more people said they were waiting for the warm weather to come out."

The shacks have a housing capacity of 50 people, and although the city is suffering a temporary lumber shortage, Conrad said residents are ready to expand to meet a larger population.

"We don't have that much left, but I think people are going to come through with donations," she said.

SPRUNG — The warm weather brings Smith College senior C.C. Fontaine out to relax in the spring weather yesterday afternoon.

Fears that students will flock to the huts for a camping trip and not in protest of budget cutbacks are realistic, but not probable, Conrad said.

"There are a few people like that, but I think people do really care about the cuts," she said, adding that students are welcome to offer support during the day if they are unable to spend nights in the city.

"If people spent one night out here, it would help change things," Conrad said. "We would make such a statement that no one could ignore it."

Chip Olson, a junior, said he intends to spend several nights at the city this week, prompted by the sudden warm weather conditions.

"Not only is it a good way to lend support for the cause, but it's fun," Olson said.

A meeting has been scheduled for 7:30 p.m. tomorrow at the "city" to discuss the election of a mayor, Arpad said.

Sociologist offers students view of foreign sex roles

By BRIAN PURCELL
Collegian Correspondent

A summer sight-seeing trip to Scandinavia that will highlight the history and current status of women in that area is being offered to University of Massachusetts students.

The trip, scheduled for June 27 to July 16, and open to all Five College area students and faculty, is sponsored by San Jose State University in California. Meg Bowman, a sociology professor at the SJSU, will direct the excursion.

The deadline for enrollment in the trip is April 1 and students are eligible for three credits in sociology through SJSU's Office of Continuing Education.

Bowman said Scandinavia is an excellent region to study because of the progressive developments for women. Scandinavian women have recently developed a larger administrative role in their government and corporations.

"They're doing some fascinating things," Bowman said. "In Norway, it is the law that all governmental agencies must include at least 40 percent women."

Frank Frick, a junior at UMass on exchange to Sweden last year, said he thought women were treated much more equally than in the United States. "I saw a lot more men with baby carriages on the streets, something I haven't seen much in the states."

While attending the University of Linkoping, Frick said he noticed an emphasis on coeducational involvement in campus activities.

The group will meet with prominent women leaders, including political figures and peace activists, she said.

Bowman said the workload for the sightseeing trip will entail mostly keeping a journal of the seminars.

Students interested in joining this year's delegation should contact Travel Programs at SJSU, she said.

Bowman, who had led similar tours in other parts of Europe and East Asia, said, "I didn't want one of these rush-rush tours with only half a day here and there. I've set it up in order to have a lot of time in each city."

undoubtedly be addressed at the conference next week.

"The ethics of long-term journalism are, in important aspects, different from the ethics of daily newspaper journalism," Sims said. "McGinniss' relationship with Jeffery MacDonald fell into one of those ethical bounderies, and for that reason it will be the subject of this panel."

Madeleine Blais, an associate journalism professor at UMass and Pulitzer Prize-winning non-fiction writer, said McGinniss "will have something interesting to add" to the conference. "Joe McGinniss, to his credit, is not afraid of controversy," she said.

McGinnis will be a panelist in the discussion on "The Creation of Everyday Life," to be held at 2 p.m. at Memorial Hall on April 7. Other panel discussions will be held on "Journalism into History," and "The Subject and the Subject: Biography and Memoir."

Also scheduled to attend the conference are New England Monthly Editor Dan Okrent, Boston Globe book review editor Gail Caldwell, and writers Taylor Branch, Richard Rhodes, Marilynne Robinson, Justin Kaplan, David Roberts, John Wideman, Anne Bernays, Tracy Kidder, Michael Norman, Mark Kramer, and J. Anthony Lukas.

Lukas, author of The Barnyard Epithet and other Obscenities: Notes on the Chicago Trial, will sit on a panel looking at journalistic approaches to historical writing. In 1985, Lukas received the American Book Award for his novel Common Ground: A turbulent decade in the lives of three American families.

"The conference was designed to give the kind of attention to non-fiction that campuses usually give to fiction and poetry," Sims said.

Educators to talk about abuse

The causes and effects of drug and alcohol abuse among students will be explored in a seminar scheduled for tonight.

"Recognizing and Dealing with Alcohol and Drug Abuse in the Schools" is sponsored by the University of Massachusetts chapter of the Music Educators National Conference.

The seminar will be co-hosted by Deidre Scott of Health Services and Marisa Weinstein, a UMass graduate student who has taught in the public school system. A guidance counselor from the Amherst public school system is also scheduled to join the discussion.

Michael LaCava, seminar coordinator and treasurer of MENC, said the seminar was being offered because alcohol and drug abuse in the schools is a continued nemesis of students, and because no specific class is offered on the subject.

"We felt that the problem is so prevalent that something needed to be done," LaCava said.

The free seminar, open to all students and faculty of the five colleges, is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m. in Room 44 of the Fine Arts Center.

speaking public relations divisions, he said.

"The students improve their Japanese skills immensely," Rosenberg said. "Also, Japan is a powerful economy and they'll be seeing it from the inside."

Rosenberg said students who succeed on a co-op in Japan may be invited back after graduation, or have an inside line to Japanese firms based in major US cities.

In general, he said, the program will place students who are interested in management or economics but "We would be happy to take anyone who is willing to work in a Japanese company."

He said venturing to Japan during a college career is a unique chance to catch a glimpse of the international market. "People are now realizing that growth and profit are dependent on the international scene," he said. "It's no longer being successful in America. Sooner or later, success is going to mean being part of the world market."

Rosenberg said at least moderate proficiency in Japanese is a pre-requisite for the program.

Program coordinators are meeting this Friday with representatives from a number of colleges interested in joining the program, including Harvard, Tufts, Northeastern, Pace and Boston universities, Smith and Springfield colleges, and the universities of Connecticut, New Haven and New Hampshire.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian, or the University unless otherwise noted.

Hurting town businesses

A proposed liquor license fee increase is scheduled to be voted on at the April 3 Amherst Select Board meeting. This wouldn't be a small increase, rather it would range from $600 to $5000, depending on the type of liquor license applied for, and the size of the business. Cuts in state funding to the town is cited as the reason behind this proposed increase.

If this proposal becomes law, the effects will be disastrous. Restaurant and bar owners would be financially strained by these outrageous increases. Many would be forced to close down or increase prices.

This would deprive the town of Amherst of its most valuable asset: the students. Students can't afford the higher prices the fee increase would create. Many would patronize businesses in other towns. This increased fee would be just another way to indirectly tax the students. With increases in tuition and fees at the University of Massachusetts, most students can hardly afford to pay an increase in prices at Amherst businesses.

While Amherst is in need of increased revenue, penalizing the people who give the town the most business and who can least afford the increases is not the way to raise funds. This will only drive students away and harm the bars and restaurants that bring so much business to Amherst.

Because of this, students should go to the April 3 Amherst Select Board meeting and voice their concerns. We have to make it clear that this increase would be unfair to the students, businesspeople, and to the town itself, by driving away the very people who generate the business Amherst needs to survive.

Boycotting a monopoly

I made a startling discovery recently. I thought I knew the major current events and political issues. Well, I'm not as informed as I thought I was.

I was talking to a friend of mine who informed me that the Coca-Cola Company has major investments in South Africa. As far as I knew (or naively assumed), American companies had already pulled out of South Africa.

Meredith O'Brien

I guess that maybe I did remember someone saying that Coke was in South Africa, but it didn't really make an impression on me until my friend described it to me.

I wondered if everyone else but me knew about this. After asking a few people, I found that about half of the people I asked knew about it. I felt a little better. Now I was joined with some apathetic company.

I decided that I wasn't going to drink Coke anymore. (Little did I know what I was getting myself into.) I started telling my friends that they shouldn't drink Coke either.

Coke is helping to support the economy in South Africa, which is run by the (minority) White government, I told them. This White government believes in apartheid, which is a system that oppresses Blacks, leaving them with no rights. It abuses Blacks and manipulates the government to keep the majority of South Africans down. It keeps Black South Africans at their mercy.

By drinking or buying Coke, I explained, they would be indirectly helping to kill South Africans.

When I began discussing my new-found discovery with people, I found that key pieces of information were missing. I learned that not only would I have to boycott Coke in my personal protest of apartheid, but I would have to boycott all Coke products.

Do you know how many Coke products there are? Coke owns Sprite, 7 Up, Tab, Fresca, Hi-C, Rambling, Fanta, Minute Maid, Canada Dry, Mellow Yellow, A&W, Sunkist, Cott, Dr. Pepper, Squirt and Welches. I would need a chart to tell me what I could or could not drink!

Then I realized that the soda machines in the DC's are all owned by Coke! Not only would I not be able to drink Coke, but I wouldn't be able to drink anything cold at the DC aside from milk, water, or whatever juices are available. (Assuming, of course, that they aren't juices that are manufactured and distributed by companies owned by the Coca-Cola Corporation.)

During my fact-finding mission, I found a piece of information unbelievable. There's a Coke machine in the New Africa House. I couldn't believe it. What a slap in the face!

One of my friends told me that she was starting a petition to get rid of the Coke machine in the New Africa House and to try to get UMass to renew its contract with Pepsi, offering Pepsi in the DC's and having more Pepsi vending machines.

When I started mentioning this petition to people, I was confronted with remarks like, "That's not fair to people who like Coke better." "Oh, that's great, by trying to get Coke out of South Africa, tons of Blacks would lose their jobs." "Eliminating Coke from this campus won't prove anything."

What about the people on campus who like Pepsi? They have to put up with Coke in the DC's. Eliminating Coke from this campus would make a political statement. As for hurting the South African economy and its Black workers . . . the only way to get a country to really pay any attention to a cause (aside from putting a price on the head of one of its citizens) is to attack them militarily or economically. Hit them where it hurts — their wallet.

Well, now I'm personally boycotting Coke products. I've successfully convinced some of my friends also. But I don't feel as informed as I would like to be. So, for now, all I have to do is remember not to drink Coke or Coke products.

Now what DOESN'T Coke own . . .

Article overlooks certain issues

The Collegian ran an article about the University of Massachusetts's decision to remove recognition of Theta Chi fraternity ("UMass removes Theta Chi," March 16). Although most of the information was technically accurate, I would like to clarify some issues which were either out of context or omitted.

First of all, it is unfortunate the newly elected Greek area president's name was mentioned in the article. While it is true that he was one of several individuals who accepted responsibility for the violation of the probation conditions, he was by no means personally implicated. In fact, he is an outstanding individual and leader who deserves respect. It's very common for fraternity or sorority members, particularly officers, to accept collective responsibility for the actions of their members, and I admire this quality among our Greek leaders.

Secondly, while it's true there have been three closings of fraternities over the past three semesters, they are by no means similar or comparable. Theta Chi was on social probation and deferred suspension with very strict conditions when the violation occurred.

I have worked closely with the brothers of Theta Chi over this past year and am very hopeful that we can turn things around and welcome them back in the future.

Wives and male sex drives: How to civilize men

Welcome back from spring break, that bracing scholastic holiday when erudite young men and women make their annual pilgrimage south to prove that once again, neither long trips nor crowded hotels nor AIDS can make them use their heads instead of their hormones, mating indiscriminately on the beach. I suppose it's the same sort of phenomena that makes people build houses on Sunderland lots that disappear beneath six inches of water every spring. The sort of thing that makes someone want to own a Yugo. The sort of thing that makes people think God has nothing to say about their lust, greed and pride as long as they show up at religious services once a year.

Since so many on our campus were getting reacquainted with their libidos last week, I thought this would be a good time to talk about the cultural dynamics of sex.

In 1973, liberal sociologist George Gilder wrote Sexual Suicide, an analysis of the feminist movement that predicted its effects on American culture and politics with uncanny accuracy. In 1986, the now more conservative Gilder re-issued the work as an updated and expanded edition entitled Men and Marriage. He had some trouble finding a publisher; feminists intimidated several enthusiastic executives since his earlier edition had so carefully exposed the falsehoods in feminist rhetoric and the shortcomings of their political solutions.

Gilder's premise is that men are brutish, compulsive creatures driven by testosterone and a need to prove themselves. In his convincing description, men have frail egos, ever-hungry gonads, and aggressive instincts. (Admit it, guys, he's right).

He sees women, on the other hand, as more even-tempered, having more power over sex, birth and nurturing because they have the invaluable capacity to easily postpone sexual indulgence indefinitely. Moreover, their natural tendencies are constructive, and in their own eyes they have nothing to prove.

Rusty Denton

Probably most feminists would agree with him up to this point. However, Gilder then argues that male aggression is channelled into useful and responsible pursuits only as long as a society confines sex within marriage. Once marriage loses its sanctity, many men are left out in the cold sexually, since the wealthiest or otherwise most desirable males philander to the detriment of less fortunate men. The losers then vent their male aggressions in antisocial or dissipative pastimes (crime, violence, sodomy, gang behavior, drugs and alcohol), which ultimately consume all the energies of a culture that tries to control them.

Gilder supports his ideas by citing studies involving hundreds and hundreds of societies, both in the present and in history. His thesis is pretty convincing: no society has ever achieved greatness if it didn't forbid polygamy (multiple wives) and polygyny (multiple female sexual partners over a lifetime). And relatively speaking, no society has ever remained strong for long once divorce or sex without marriage became common. The reason is simple: without binding marriage and family obligations, men as a group have no natural reason to act civilized.

This message has been anathema to the feminists. First, many think marriage is oppressive to women. Second, they dislike evidence that the fragile male ego and strong male sex drives can't be socialized away — which shows that women misunderstand men just as much as men misunderstand women. Third, feminists refuse to accept the idea that male aggression alone drives the progress of society, and that when it is underestimated, male aggression is responsible for cultural suicide.

If American women weren't so busy worshipping independence and American men weren't so busy appeasing primal urges, Gilder's ideas would probably be recognized for their critical importance to national destiny. But that might be expecting college students to use their heads. People who go rutting on the beaches and panting and pawing in their dorm rooms do not produce a nation that acts in rational ways.

The Goode, the Brad and the ugly from Shock LP

By GRAEME THOMSON

DISC JUNKIE

What is it with you yanks and XTC? I mean, I'm not denying that they're a good band or anything, but how can you possibly confer godlike status on a bunch of ex-students from Chipping Norton? Come to think of it, how can you call anything from Chipping Norton godlike? That young upstart and now, we discover, drippy-hippy (peace? - that sounds like commie talk to me) pseudo-Disc Junkie Drukman obviously feels he can. Mind you, he reckons he's pretty god-like himself, judging from what he said he was going to do to moi-meme (sorry - we don't do circumflexes) the week before last.

By the way, do you know that if you take the word DRUKMAN and play around with the letter order, you get the word KRUMNAD which bears a remarkable similarity to KREMLIN, wouldn't you say? I rest my case.

Anyway, enough dilly-dallying. Today I'm going to talk about the Goode, the Brad and the Ugly - actually, we'll skip the ugly part, because there certainly isn't anything the slightest bit unattractive about the new Brad Goode record, Shock of the New (Delmark).

At only 24, Goode is one of an increasing number of precocious young players and composers who have taken the jazz world by storm. If Courtney Pine is the new Coltrane, and Tommy Smith the new Parker, then I suppose you could call Brad Goode the new Clifford Brown. Quite frankly, I don't see why these guys all want to be ghosts before they've lived, but I have to admit that Goode is a very polished performer with an astonishing range for one of such tender years.

The first track on Shock of the New, "Clock Radio" is a great opener, a furious barrage of "dat-dats' riding on a fast funky rhythm section. It's not quite a deep enough groove to be acid jazz, but does for Trumpet what Supersax did for the Ax. Then we're on to more familiar be-bop territory with "A Tribute to Clifford and Sonny," on which Goode's trumpet stands head and shoulders above the rather generic tenor sax of Lin Halliday.

Throughout this record Goode plays with a purity that you would normally associate with classical trumpet, and the juxtaposition of styles, most evident on the simple balladic 'Winter Song' is an interesting one. He also experiments with string arrangements to varying degrees of kitsch effect. I loved the Brazil-style "You Don't Know What Love Is," but then again, latin jazz is one of my few vices, and I indulge myself to the full.

Check out Shock of the New for yourself. I guarantee you'll find nothing here that's either shocking or new, but you'll have a real fun time.

Next time I'll be going where music lovers fear to tread, exposing the evil cesspool that goes by the name of Windham Hill.

Angela Davis' political and personal vendetta

BOOK REVIEW

Radicals, gather round. Angela Davis, two time vice-presidential candidate on the Communist Party, USA ticket, and founder and co-chair of the Natioal Alliance Against Racist and Political Repression, has written a new book. It's as strong and socially stirring as ever.

Taken from her internationally acclaimed lectures and writings, Women, Culture and Politics deals with the struggle for racial, sexual and economic equality that Davis has fought for since the 60's.

As always, her writing is controversial, thought provoking and moving. Her examples of rape victims and sexually exploited Egyptian women will disturb even the most conservative of minds. Her recounts of the economically deprived, including a story of a Black woman who gave birth to a stillborn after three hospitals turned her away due to insurance mix-ups, are equally riveting.

Davis discusses other topical issues, such as the arms race and the national debt, with just as much fire and fury. The woman is determined to show that she is committed to having Black women concern themselves with issues that affect all people, not just Black women.

There are a few instances where Davis goes too far. She makes about 10 too many references to Ronald Reagan's acting background, and blames him for absolutely every problem in America today. This is probably due to the fact that, while governor of California, Reagan played a key role in the firing of Davis from her position of professor at the University of California (because of her connection with the Communist Party). This led to her trial and acquittal on conspiracy charges. Keep in mind, however, even with this personal vendetta, nearly all of Davis' arguments are overflowing with facts to back them up.

Read this book, get yourself worked up to a frenzy, then go out and save the world.

Earlier this semester, the University hired a full-time Japanese professor who is scheduled to begin teaching in the fall. Gjertson said that, despite original opposition from the provosts' office, the administration has reaffirmed its commitment to the program.

"We're on the way back," he said, attributing some of the comeback to the new cooperative education program.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Look forward to brighter days for a business partnership. A fortunate gamble could pay off. Use the utmost discretion with any kind of legal contract or financial transaction. Avoid telegraphing your punches.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You make real progress on the work front but may have some difficulty with a close relationship. Seek experts' help. Return to the basics and get back into shape. Change your eating habits.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) You feel re-energized as you plunge into your chores. New rewards will include additional power, prestige and money. A personal relationship benefits from more nurturing. Offer encouragement, not criticism.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) An inside tip clues you in to a great financial deal. Check all the details before making a commitment. Your reputation could be on the line. Cut expenses wherever you can.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Start the day in high spirits and good things will come your way. An unexpected check or windfall gives you cause for celebration. Better concentrate on saving instead of spending now.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Do not become completely separated from your environment, but do take a breather to collect yourself. Be firm with the opposition and a struggle will end. Friends are supportive. Return the favor.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Your charm wins you a new friend, but it will not solve a communication mixup with an authority figure. Be specific and logical in all your dealings. Do not fret over the impossible.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Go ahead and be adventurous! You will find exciting new vistas. You are given something valuable in return for a good deed. Promise to improve and loved one will be affectionate again.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Follow your instincts – they are right on target. Movement and change are good for both business and romance. Stop going around in circles. Get rid of excess emotional baggage and push forward.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) A financial situation may not be as sound and you had hoped. Resist an urge to overindulge. Stick to your diet and exercise regimen. Someone who has ignored you in the past is attentive.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Confidential information will help you improve a work or domestic situation that has been too confining. Act like a professional at work. Keep your personal affairs strictly private and in the background.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Reduce your workload by enlisting your associates' cooperation. Shopping trips can be fun. Buy something a little daring or trendy and you will attract admiring glances. Romance enjoys highly favorable influences.

men's gymnastics closes season

However, those were the good individual performances for UMass. As a team, the Minutemen had trouble on the pommel horse and according to Johnson, were the victims of some bad judging during the horizontal bar.

"I thought we'd do better on the pommel horse," Johnson said. "We had four guys out of six fall off. We had pretty much been beating everybody in that event all year."

The Minutemen didn't beat many people last week. Their team score of 41.25 was fifth out of the eight teams. Not one Minuteman made it to the finals of the horse competition.

Senior Joe Fitzgerald, UMass' ace pommel horse man, scored an 8.55 which was not quite good enough to make it to the final round. That score is a good three-tenths under what Fitzgerald has been hitting all year.

The high bar was where UMass really got hurt. Its 43.2 is subpar compared to past performances this season.

Senior Jay Ronayne, normally UMass' best swinger on the horizontal bar, received just a 8.35 from the judges. The Minutemen had been able to count on Ronayne for a nine or better all year. Ronayne was bothered by some tore tendons in one of his feet though and it apparently had an effect on his routine.

"I think he was still hurting a little bit," Johnson said.

It was the last team meet of the year for UMass. The Minutemen had been building up to the EIGL's all season. It was just the wrong time for an off day to occur.

"We're really in the top bracket of that league," Johnson said. "And I think we just have to learn to train for championship meets better. You've got to anticipate that your scores are going to be lower and you've got to be psychologically ready for that."

Technically the season wasn't over for the Minutemen after the EIGLs. This past weekend, UMass sent five gymnasts down to the East Coast Athletic Conference Championships in Pittsburgh.

Team scores were not tallied. It was strictly individual competition. Eggers had a big meet, finishing second behind only Navy's Mark Burgess on the horizontal bar. Eggers hit a 9.3 in the preliminary round and a 9.25 in the finals.

Senior Tim Myers finished seventh on the pommel horse with an 8.25. Booker finished seventh in the floor exercise and the vault.

thal, leads UConn in hitting at .412 and sophomore Pete Walker, who plays outfield and pitches is second at .333.

After losing the first three games of their trip through the Carolinas and Virginia, the Huskies rebounded to finish at 4-5, and have gone 3-1 up North since. Over the weekend, they took two of three games from Boston College.

UConn has won half of its games and probably has its starters in place. Right now, UMass is only halfway there.

Collegian basketball tournament

What will you remember Spring Break '89 for? For many, it will be the memories of a warm, tropical paradise, but for those us of us less fortunate, this past week's excitement came in the form of the NCAA men's basketball tournament games. All of them.

And for us really less fortunate, we had to leaf through the 630-or-so Collegian contest entries (roughly 250 people chose Georgetown to win it all, better luck next year). And, although we are still tallying some of the entries (we hope to have the leaders in tomorrow's paper) we have made some observations.

1)As mentioned above, almost half of you picked Georgetown, 2)Virginia and Seton Hall's trips to the Cinderella ball wreaked havoc on most of the entries and, 3) if you don't have around the low 70s, or at least a chance of it, you are pretty much out of this year's running. Our best guess figures that the our winner will land somewhere in the 90s.

So, as you can tell, we're still pretty disorganized here at contest central, but we promise to do our homework and catch up with all the results. Stay tuned.

P.S. — a source in the UMass basketball office has told the Collegian that basketball secretary Bonnie Martin has more points than all the UMass basketball coaches in their contest.

In goal, All-America netminder Sal LoCascio saw action in just two games, allowing four goals while posting 14 saves. Sophomore Ted Kellerman (five goals, 15 saves) and freshman Ray Suris (five goals, nine saves) saw time in all three contests.

Garber was also impressed with the play of sophomore attack Bill Begian and freshman Rich Mullins and Mario Lopez. Junior midfielder Marc Feinberg also played a key role after senior co-captain Chris Zusi popped a knee prior to the trip.

The Gorillas will get their first test when last year's national runner-up, Cornell (4-0) comes to town in the home opener tomorrow at 3 p.m. at the Boyden Hill.

Minutemen finish fourth at EIGLs

Season ends on a disappointing note despite overall finish

This was the meet of the year for the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team, the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League Championships.

The Minutemen headed to Syracuse University the Thursday before spring break as the No. 2 team in the EIGL. But they came back to Amherst a few days later with a fourth place finish in the eight team field and an overall finish on the year of third.

Third to the United States Naval Academy, who captured the league championship for the third time, and Temple University – who the Minutemen had beaten earlier in the season over at the Boyden Gymnastics Center.

UMass' overall finish this year in the EIGL is tied for the highest finish of a UMass team in the last 26 years. Yet, the Minutemen had to have been disappointed having gone into the meet as the only team with a chance of stopping Navy's unbeaten streak in the EIGL.

The order of finish went Navy (269.7), Temple (265.35), Syracuse (262.7), UMass (261.45), Southern Connecticut State University, the United States Military Academy, Springfield, and East Stroudsburg rounded out the bottom half of the meet.

The 261.45 points was well off the school record of 268.05 that the Minutemen had set just a few weeks ago. The Minutemen did not have their best performance of the year yet it was not quite as weak as the score indicates. The judges were tough.

"In the dual meet season, some of those small tenths are overlooked," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "When you get to the championship meet, they bring in the best judges who are there to separate out the best routines so they are looking for every little tenth."

One gymnast who the judges separated from most of the other competition was senior co-captain Bart Balocki. Balocki finished fourth overall in the all-around competition, racking up 94.2 points for the weekend.

UMass faired about as well as any team in the all-around as freshman Calvin Booker finished fifth (94) and the other co-captain, John Eggers finished sixth (90). Bill Roth of Temple topped everyone in the all-around.

"The reason we had three guys that were able to do that is because we had three guys that were able to make it through the compulsory routines," Johnson said.

Eggers captured the highest place of the weekend, a third in the still rings with a 9.3 for his routine, trailing just Ramiro Mora of Springfield (9.45) and Joe Rowlette of Temple (9.4).

Just the Lax

Gorillas go 3-0 to open

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

When one is geographically plotting the boundaries of the world of college lacrosse, a very distinct line can be drawn up somewhere around the Mississippi River.

Despite this fact, those in the other half of the continent are trying to boost their stock among lax powers. As a result, for the first time ever, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team trekked to California to start its season.

At best, the Gorillas' trip to the Left Coast can be compared to a Goodwill tour. It was like the Harlem Globetrotters traveling to Kenya, or someplace like that, and trying to teach tribesmen how to play basketball.

And then, they kick their butts all over the countryside.

A trio of schools in California got a rude lesson that they aren't ready to bump heads with big time lacrosse. The Gorillas amassed 81 goals in opening their season with three easy wins.

"It was a good trip. The kids played really well," UMass coach Dick Garber said. "The California teams had good athletes, but they didn't play defense worth a hoot. It looked like intramural basketball defense."

And everyone knows the kind of street-ball attitude that could be taken against such swiss-cheese. But the Gorillas kept their heads and, despite the relative lack of competition stuck to their game plan and worked it to perfection.

"Our execution was great. We had a lot of transition goals," Garber said.

Coming into the season, Garber had anticipated the Gorillas having a potent offense, running at will with potential Loyola Marymount-like results. Their present 27 goal-per-game average will attest to that.

"It was a combination of our transition offense and their lack of team defense," Garber said of the three blowouts. "We were hitting on all cylinders, scoring five- or six-pass goals. We're a very unselfish team."

UMass started the week against the University of California-Davis and blitzed them, 32-6. Senior attack Paul Ganci scored five of his team-high 10 goals in this game and Jim McAleavey eight of his team-high 18 assists in the game, as 16 different players had at least a goal.

Two days later the Gorillas were tentatively scheduled to face Stanford, but the Cardinal backed out. "We probably scared them away," Garber said. After losing to Siena in the NCAA tourney, Stanford probably couldn't take two embarassments in one week.

However, UMass still had two more sets of sheep lined up in Sonoma State and UCal-Berkeley. The Gorillas disposed of these teams almost as smoothly, winning by 25-6 and 24-3 margins.

Statistically, UMass was led by McAleavey, as the sophomore attack added eight goals to his 18 assists for a team-high 26 points. Ganci had 10 goals and six assists for 16 points, while junior attack Scott Hiller (6-5-11), junior middie Tim Soudan (9-1-10) and freshman attack Mike Cain (7-3-10) all cracked the double-digit point barrier.

Minutemen ready to face UConn, more questions

After going 5-5 this past week in Florida, the Minutemen and senior co-captain Steve Kern hope to set the bill straight today when they face UConn.

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone had two main goals for his team during its Spring Break Florida trip.

He wanted to come back with a .500 record or better and, by winning its last three games to finish at 5-5, the Minutemen achieved that.

The other, and perhaps more important, objective was to settle people into positions on this young team to prepare for the regular season, which begins today at 3 p.m. at Lorden Field against the University of Connecticut.

As of yesterday morning, Lorden Field was not in playable condition. One possible option would be to play the game in Storrs, Conn., but a decision on that will not be made until this morning.

Through the first nine games of its Florida trip, UMass appeared to be well on its way to establishing the starters goal, but a freak injury to freshman second baseman Dan Biagini changed everything.

Biagini was chasing a pop-up against Montclair State but slipped and landed on the ball, rupturing his spleen. Biagini will most likely miss the season, and Stone will have to do some quick shuffling.

"It's unfortunate that it happened, period," Stone said. "But it also came in the last game, which is the worst possible time."

Stone said he would try four people: Kevin Correa, Dave Edwards, Brian Donovan, and Tom Murray, at second yesterday in practice to see who would start today.

"We know Correa can do the job with the glove," Stone said. "But we're also trying to see who swings the best bat."

Donovan, a junior, had six hits in 11 trips to the plate in Florida.

Among the UMass regulars, outfielders Mike Chambers (10-for-25, .400) and Drew Seccafico (13-for-37, .351) are the leaders.

One position that isn't in doubt for the Minutemen tomorrow is the starting pitcher, as senior righthander Dave Telgheder will take the mound. Telgheder went 0-1 in Florida, losing a 6-3 decision to Eastern Kentucky.

Telgheder's opponent was not known as of yesterday afternoon, but UConn has five more games through the weekend, so the Minutemen may not see their ace.

UM teams win 3-on-3 tourney

Two teams from the University of Massachusetts were crowned champions of the Schick 3-on-3 tournament last week. This was the first time ever that both winners came from the same school.

On the men's side, the team of Garrick Amos, Nady Pierre, John Phillips and Tracy Browne went undefeated into the final against a team from Bryant College. The final was held on the parquet floor of the Boston Garden, and UMass was victorious, 33-28.

The women entered a team in the tourney for the first time and also rolled to victory. The team of Sue Gaudette, Carla DeSantis and April Kater, all members of the women's soccer team, defeated a team from Western Connecticut College, 33-14. Margie Jaede, also of the women's soccer team, was also a member of the team through the tournament, but missed the final game.

Both teams were honored during halftime of the Mar. 20 Celtics game against San Antonio. The school was given plaques for both teams.

Activists fill SUB for abortion debate

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

More than 600 people filled the Student Union Ballroom last night to hear Phyllis Schlafly, president of the Eagle Forum, and Judy Goldsmith, former president of the National Organization for Women, debate abortion.

Pro-choice activists dominated the event, demonstrating with signs before the debate and interrupting the speakers with cheers, hisses and boos.

Goldsmith, who now works for the National Center for Policy Alternatives, said "The fact is, it isn't possible to stop abortion and we all know that. You can only make them illegal and unsafe."

Schlafly, who often had to speak over yells and hisses from the audience, said, "The bottom line is the right to life should not depend on someone else wanting you."

Schafly went on to compare legal abortions to Hitler's extermination of innocent people during WWII.

Goldsmith argued Hitler had actually executed Aryan women for having abortions while sterilizing much of the rest of the population. "Reproductive decision making by government policy is profoundly offensive to democratic principles," she said.

Goldsmith said Roe Vs. Wade, the Supreme Court decision which legalized abortion in 1973, is in danger of being overturned by the increasingly conservative Supreme Court.

Schlafly, who has been credited with the defeat of the Equal Rights Amendment, called Roe vs. Wade "the worst decision in the history of the court."

She said since then legal abortions have been misused by irresponsible and promiscuous people and by couples seeking only to determine the sex of their children.

Goldmsith countered, "Women are motivated to have abortions by compelling human need. People who speak of women having abortions as a matter of convenience truly insult women."

Both acknowledged religion plays a role in the debate. Goldsmith said many religions in this country differ in their beliefs about abortion, but said no religion should be allowed to use the power of the state to impose its theology on others.

Schlafly said "The government didn't make you pregnant, the government didn't have anything to do with it." But that is the function of the government to make sure you don't kill another person.

Following the debate, more than 40 members of the audience lined up to ask questions.

One young woman who said she had had an abortion charged Schlafly with "arrogantly and condescendingly" telling women that by choosing to sleep with a man they allow themselves to get pregnant.

"I want you to tell me how I raped myself," the young woman said. More than half the audience gave the young woman a standing ovation.

Schlafly responded, "Didn't you go to the hospital?" She then said a rape victim should get a surgical procedure done which could prevent the pregnancy.

Although Schlafly said the procedure was not the same as an abortion, Goldsmith argued that it is.

Alar scare harvests less fruitful crop

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

A debate over the chemical Alar, which regulates apple growth, is creating effects that are being acutely felt by MacIntosh apple growers throughout New England, a University of Massachusetts pesticide toxicologist said yesterday.

John Clark said last year orchards lost 50 percent of their crop because they cannot use Alar.

Alar causes MacIntosh apples, which ripen over a three-week period, to stay on the tree once ripe instead of falling to the ground as they would otherwise, said Clark.

This allows farmers to harvest their crop all at once, saving them valuable time and money, he said.

Clark contends too much time and money has been spent on whether Alar is dangerous to humans. Since the debate began in 1985 processors such as Very Fine have refused to accept apples exposed to Alar, he said.

Because of this, growers are using three or four different chemicals in an attempt to achieve the results Alar provided, he said.

"I don't really know what the big deal about Alar is. There is really and truely no reason for doing what we have done. It's almost criminal," he said referring to the extensive research and energy expended by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency over what Clark terms a "non-problem."

Preliminary studies done in 1985 for the EPA to determine the toxicity of Alar were reviewed by an outside scientific board and rejected on the basis of flawed data and a flawed experimental design, he said.

The 1985 studies showed that mice exposed to Alar's breakdown product, unsemetrical dimethylhydrazide, developed benign tumors of the lung at a greater rate than the control group, Clark said.

Judge orders trial to settle snowball dispute

By the Associated Press

NORTHAMPTON — A judge has ordered a trial to be held "before the first snowfall" in a suit by Amherst College against the University of Massachusetts arising out of the traditional snowball fight between students at the two schools.

In its civil suit, Amherst College contends it suffered $3,112 in property damage in the December battle, as well as $1,788 in 1987.

Two years ago, UMass voluntarily paid $3,000 to Amherst College for broken windows and other damage from that year's snowball fight, but the college maintained in the suit that its total losses that winter came to $4,452 and the university should be required to pay the full amount.

Judge John J. Murphy Jr. did not set a trial date. But he said at a hearing Monday in Hampshire Superior Court he was reluctant to issue a preliminary injunction, requested by the Amherst college, forbidding University of Massachusetts students from throwing snowballs at students from the private college.

"I take it that it is Amherst College's position that this is a one-way street, that the snowballs only go one way," Murphy asked.

"It seems to me that this is a two-way street that's been going on for 15 years and you are asking me to enjoin only one side," Murphy persisted.

US violates rules of America's Cup, loses trophy

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — A judge yesterday disqualified the San Diego Yacht Club as the winner of last September's America's Cup challenge and awarded the international trophy to a New Zealand club.

State Supreme Court Justice Carmen Ciparick said the San Diego club "violated the spirit" of the 101-year-old Deed of the Gift, which sets out the rules for the America's Cup race.

The San Diego crew, skippered by Dennis Conner, sailed a catamaran to victory against the Mercury Bay Yacht Club's 90-foot monohull in a race off San Diego in September, recapturing the America's Cup.

But the judge said, "It is clear that a catamaran may not defend an America's Cup competition against a monohull."

The Mercury Bay Yacht Club of Auckland, New Zealand, first came to court in 1987, arguing it should be allowed to challenge San Diego in a one-on-one race for the race for the Cup in a boat larger than the 12-meter yacht ordinarily used.

The New Zealand club also argued the race should be held in an interval less than the customary once every four years.

The deed establishing the Cup requires only a 10-month interval between races and sets no limit for boat length; it also does not require a series of elimination races as there have been for the past several decades.

A judge on Dec. 21, 1987, agreed to the matchup, and ordered San Diego to defend the cup against the New Zealand challenge and its 90-foot craft. San Diego was to use in 12-meter boat, which runs about 45 feet at the waterline.

But Conner instead decided to use a catamaran - a much faster and more maneuverable craft - and easily defeated the challenging craft financed by Michael Fay.

Fay went back to court after losing that race and asked the judge to invalidate the results.

Air Force grounds bombers

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Air Force has temporarily grounded its fleet of B-1B bombers in a precautionary move following an incident Monday in which an internal fuel tank on one of the bombers was punctured, the Pentagon said yesterday.

The incident occurred at Dyess Air Force Base, Texas, during a routine pre-flight check before a B-1B training flight, said Dan Howard, the Pentagon's chief spokesman.

The fuel tank appears to have been punctured when the mechanism that sweeps the bomber's wings back and forth malfunctioned, he said.

The spokesman, disclosing the grounding during a regular Pentagon news briefing, said the bomber's crew was sweeping the wings forward and backward before takeoff and discovered the wings were not moving evenly together.

"It was noted that they were out of sync," Howard said. "The third time that they swept the wings forward, a clunking noise was heard; they shut down the aircraft, and they observed the fuel leak. They're currently conducting an investigation to see what caused the problem."

Howard said it appeared the left wing, in being swept to a full forward position, "exceeded its normal limits and subsequently fuel was noticed in the wing root area."

The Strategic Air Command has suspended training flights on its B-1B aircraft until further notice, Howard said.

The spokesman said there was no indication that the incident was related to a Nov. 8, 1988, crash of a B-1B bomber at Dyess "or any other previous incident."

The November crash has been blamed on a wing fire, the precise cause of which remains unknown.

Deficit may affect employment of grads

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

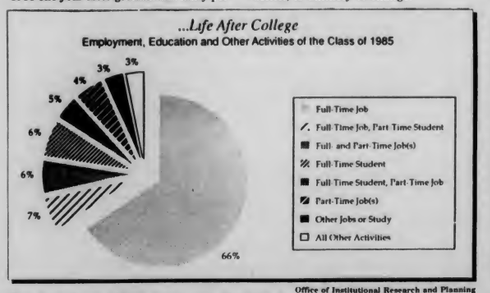
Students graduating from the University of Massachusetts are likely to secure full-time jobs, but the impact of the federal deficit on the United States' economy may alter this trend for future graduates, according to a report issued by the Office of Institutional Research and Planning.

Robert DeLauretis, OIRP director, said, "[The deficit] is going to have a whole variety of negative effects but it seems to be a better reason to get a degree."

The office sent surveys to half of an estimated 4,000 graduates of the Class of 1985 one year after graduation. Sixty percent of the graduates responded and the results were published last semester in a report entitled "One Year Out: The Class of 1985."

The report, the first of its kind at UMass, showed that on the average, eight of 10 graduates from the Class of 1985 found full-time employment shortly after graduation, and many also held a part-time job or became part-time students.

DeLauretis said the unemployment rate among the graduates, only two percent for those completely without jobs and four percent for those with only part-time jobs, is not unusual and, despite the looming deficit, is unlikely to change.



Office of Institutional Research and Planning
Excerpt from "One year out: the Class of 1985."

"It's not striking to me, it's just good news," he said. "A lot of things can happen, but I think this is within the range of expectation."

Nearly 90 percent of the graduates fell into two categories of employment: managerial and professional specialty; and technical, sales and administrative support, and the average income of those employed full-time was $15,000 to $20,000, DeLauretis said.

Unfortunately, he said, women dominated the lower ends of the wage brackets, with three fourths of those employed full time earning less than $20,000 annually.

The majority of women graduates held gender-stereotypic and traditionally lower-paying occupations like teachers and clerical workers, while men dominated the upper income scales by holding jobs in computers, engineering, or as supervisors in farming and forestry, DeLauretis said.

The report showed that 150 men who were employed full time earned more than $25,000 annually compared to slightly more than 40 women in the same category, he said.

"That's the sad part of the story and a large part of the real story here," DeLauretis said, adding that more than 20 percent of males became engineers, a high-paying position, while less than five percent of women ventured into this field.

The members of the class were highly active in extracurricular activities, with nearly 90 percent claiming regular participation, the report said.

The report, which yielded largely positive results, also found that although more than 40 percent of the graduates had originally preferred to attend another institution, more than 90 percent said they would now prefer the University if they were asked to make the desicion again.

An overwhelming amount of the minority respondents, 80 percent, also said they would prefer UMass over another institution, but that number remains significantly lower than the number of White graduates, the report said.

Responses varied somewhat according to ethnicity, but only slightly in the area of occupational status, the report noted. Only 44 percent of minority student graduates were satisfied with religious programs available, but 71 percent of White students reported satisfaction, the report said.

Graduates gave high marks to the University's transit system, the University's overall capacity, course variety, social and cultural programs, and intramural athletic activities, the report said.

But, the report showed that graduates were less pleased with financial aid opportunities, the University Placement Service, access to computers and non-major courses, and career and academic advising.

DeLauretis said the office will continue to conduct standardized surveys of successive classes and will publish the results every three to four years in an attempt to learn about the impact of the University on its students.

The office is publishing an "Educational Assessment Bulletin," which is a series of reports issued over several months to the administration designed to measure the educational impact of campus programs on students.

Grad student funding to MassPIRG at stake

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

Graduate students will have the opportunity to choose whether to continue funding MassPIRG in April's Graduate Student Senate elections, according to last night's vote by the senate.

The question was also on the ballot for the SGA elections, held over two weeks ago. Like the SGA, it will read: "Do you favor the continued existence of a MassPIRG chapter at UMass/Amherst to be funded by a $4 per student per semester waivable fee as of the fall of 1989? This represents a $1 increase in the fee. Any student who chooses not to support MassPIRG may waive the fee."

David Lippiett, a professional staff worker for MassPIRG, said at the SGA elections, "80 percent of the undergrads supported the question on the ballot."

He added that at several schools, including Southeastern Massachusetts University, the local MassPIRG chapter would include an insert with each student's bill, explaining how MassPIRG works. They would then decide whether to pay or waive the bill. When asked why the UMass chapter didn't do the same, Lippiett said it was "limited by purchasing power."

Lippiett said that MassPIRG has explained their positions on consumer and environmental issues through recent mailings to graduate students. "We've become visible for the graduate elections," he said.

Several senators, including senate President Gita van Heerden, raised the issue of the group's financial accountability to the students. Although Lippiett did not show the MassPIRG budget, the senate approved putting the question on the ballot, 27-1, with 1 abstention.

Other items discussed during the meeting included:

- A unanimous endorsement of a letter by Senators Steve Mabee and Joel Sparks of the Geology/Geography department to Vice Chancellor of Administration and Finance Paul Page suggesting that the University's winter parking policy be modified so that people working late in the labs would not have to move their cars except in a snowstorm. Currently, cars would be moved to designated lots between 1 and 6 a.m.
- A proposal by Steve Jones of the Chemistry department to cut funding of five RSOs, including the LBGA and the LBGA's Counseling Collective, saying, "...there is essentially no participation by graduate students." It was later rejected.

Although this may seem alarming, Clark said malignant tumors are more of a concern when dealing with toxic substance testing and that the mice used are subsceptible to lung tumors anyway because they are bred to be highly sensitive to toxic chemicals.

Since then, new studies have been started but have not generated enough data to draw any definite conclusions about links between Alar and cancer, he said.

"For a human being to be exposed at the same exposure level [as the mice], a 155 pound man would have to eat 200,000 pounds of apples per day for his entire lifetime. And that only gets you to the place where it causes benign tumors in mice," he said.

Clark is angry over the consequences of the Alar controversy because he believes the public is in more danger from increased pesticide spraying used to control apple maggots which breed in fallen apples — Alar apples stay on the tree, he said.

"We're using more compounds just to try to get the same effects as Alar. As far as I can see, you're being exposed to more pesticides not less when you take Alar off the market," he said.

State buys land to protect rare beetles

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — The state of Massachusetts is spending $61,000 to buy 30 acres of land along the Connecticut River where officials believe the state's last population of a rare tiger beetles can be found.

The only other spot in the country where the puritan tiger beetle can be found is along the Chesapeake Bay, according to Judy Jacobs of the US Fish and Wildlife Service, who is working on a proposal to have the species listed as threatened.

"It's not one of the flashy tiger beetles. But it is very tasteful and attractive," she said yesterday. "It's sort of an understated dull brown with white markings."

Funds for the purchase came from a 1987 state bond issue for acquisition of open lands, said Henry Woolsey, coordinator of the state's endangered species program.

The more common tiger beetles, which come in a wide variety of bright colors, including iridescent greens, blues and bronzes, have long been favorites of small boys and other beetle fanciers.

"They are pretty," Jacob said. "And some people collect them like baseball cards." But most of the puritan tiger beetle's decline has been caused by destruction of habitat rather than inroads by collectors, she said.

Until the Northampton population was discovered in 1986, wildlife officials had believed the half-inch long beetle, which once could be found from New Hampshire south to Hartford, Conn., was gone from the Connecticut River Valley, said Phillip Nothnagele, a Windsor, Vt., consultant who has been tracking the insect.

He counted 120 puritan tiger beetles at the Northampton site in 1987, but found only 15 to 20 last year.

"We know so little about them that we really don't know how accurate those numbers are," he said. "For one thing, they like sunny days near the water and unfortunately the weather was overcast on most of the days I was out counting last summer."

One of the things that make tiger beetles particularly vulnerable is their grubs live for one to two years in burrows on sandy beaches where they lie in wait for the insects and other little creatures that they eat, Jacobs said.

"They are pretty ferocious predators," she said. "They will take on just about anything that is smaller than they are."

But they can't hope to compete with off-road vehicles, according to Woolsey, who said protection of particularly sensitive areas was one of the reasons the state bought the property. "It's also a very good piece of flood plain forest," he said.

The Budget Cuts

How the state budget will affect UMass

Each dean and vice chancellor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst received a letter last Wednesday detailing the amount of funding they will have to work with in the next fiscal year.

The letters are from Executive Vice Chancellor and Provost Richard O'Brien, and give a dollar amount based on a two percent cut which will be necessary if the Massachusetts senate approves the current version of the state budget.

This version of the budget calls for UMass to be "level-funded" at $169 million in fiscal 1990, which begins July 1. Although UMass is slated to receive the same amount next year as it did in the current year, the budget does not cover state-mandated salary raises, maintenence, and other costs carried over from last year, according to Acting Budget Director Joyce Hatch.

"There are costs that are going to be carried over from last year that a level-funded budget does not cover," Hatch said.

In a sense, UMass is lucky. Some line-items on the budget last year, such as library acquisitions and some acid rain research, have been "zero-funded," for fiscal 1990. (Stories below)

The two percent cut comes on the heels of a $5 million cut to the University by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis in November, and fee increases totaling $280 to meet the cuts.

The House also has not begun to work on the capital outlay budget, which is dependant on the operating budget, from which the University is funded. The capital outlay budget funds projects such repairs and renovations to campus buildings.

"The big concern is the lack of a capital outlay budget . . . if you should lose the capital outlay you have to defer," Hatch said.

The Fine Arts Center, for instance, was slated to receive $4 million to $5 million in repairs in this fiscal year, according to FAC Director James MacRostie. He said the repairs had already gone out to bid when the capital outlay money was cancelled.

MacRostie said the capital outlay funds would have created more handicap accessibility in the facility, and repaired leaks and other damage, the building has been subjected to in the 12 years since it opened.

One project that is not threatened currently is the William D. Mullins Convocation Center. Money for this project — $125 million — has been transferred to the Massachusetts Building Authority, Hatch said, and cannot be taken back by the state. The money is being held and invested until there is enough to build the arena.

The current budget also has no funding for the "53rd week." The 53rd week must be funded every six years or so to pay salaries when the calendar year runs more than 52 weeks. Hatch said the current version of the budget authorizes the commissioner of administration to insitiute a bi-weekly pay schedule, which places some paydays in the next year, in effect, putting off the problem for later.

There is the possibility some of the money for state colleges and universities could be restored by amendments by state senators.

Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, attempted to amend the state budget to add 15.7 million to the state's higher education system. His amendment failed, however, 78-73.

Several state house Democrats, however, such as Sen. John Olver, D-Northampton, are saying the budget in its present form is $250 out of balance, and further cuts, or an increase in taxes, may be necessary.

The senate is scheduled to vote on the budget in early May. After the final budget is approved and signed by the governor, the deans and vice chancellors will get the actual final amount they have to work with for next year.

The Fine Arts Center, scheduled to get about $4 million in repairs. All funding for the repairs was scrapped.

Maple research about to end

Since 1987, Gretchen Smith has been researching the negative effect of several environmental factors on maple trees in western Massachusetts.

Smith, working out of Holdsworth Hall, was studying "maple decline," a deterioration in the health of maple trees due to acid rain, air pollution, and the insect pear thrips, among other factors. Her research formed a base from which other scientists could work.

Farmers were so concerned about the effect of the pear thrips that many decided not to tap trees this season to make maple syrup, losing a vital part of their income and ending long-held tradition.

Gretchen Smith

Now it appears that Smith's research, which may have led to answers about how to deal with the thrips and other environmental factors, will end.

Smith, a full-time researcher, is funded through the state's Executive Office of Environmental Affairs. Since 1987, the EOEA has funded the research with $90,000 which pays her salary, the salaries of several teaching assistants, and the expenses of monitoring 10 plots of maple trees in western Massachusetts.

That $90,000, which is the only source of funding for her research, has been eliminated from the budget approved by the Massachusetts House of Representatives early this month.

Asked what she will do if the money is not restored, she said, "Look for other work, I guess."

Smith says the research is important because the studies were done in the field, not in a greenhouse.

The research may be even more important because of the significance of maple in the Massachusetts economy. Aside from maple sugaring, maple tree are part of the timber industry, and the tourism and recreation industries. Smith estimates the maple industry to be worth $3 million to $4 million per year to the state's economy.

"Her work is very important, forests are an extremely important resource," said Rick Taupier, assistant secretary for research at EOEA. "This kind of research is unprecedented in the Commonwealth and in New England," he said.

Taupier said there is also the impact on scenic beauty and wildlife if the trees continue to decline, which is not measureable in dollar amounts.

Smith said that because of the number of factors at work on maple trees, no one factor such as thrips cn be blamed. Other threats facing the trees are road salts, which enter the trees through ground water, air pollution, the deterioration of the ozone layer, droughts, and other insects, such as the gypsy moths in recent years.

What Smith is sure of is that all these factors are contributing to maple decline.

Acquisitions suffer 2/3 cut

State funding for library acquisitions at all 29 of the state colleges and Universities has been cut completely for next year. At UMass-Amherst this means library acquisitions will be cut by two-thirds from this year — a loss of $2 million — according to Richard Talbot, University director of libraries.

Talbot said the state's Board of Regents of Higher Education had requested $9 million for fiscal 1990 for the college system. This was up from $7.5 million for the current fiscal year, in which UMass-Amherst received about $2 million.

In Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' proposed budget, library acquisitions were trimmed to $4 million. The budget from the house Ways and Means Committee, pending approval in the state senate, contains no money for library acquisitions.

Asked how this cut would impact library acquisitions, Talbot said, "Catastrophic is not too strong a word. It means that there are a great many things we want to be able to add to our collection and won't be able to add."

Talbot said the library would have to cut its periodical subscriptions in half, and would buy approximately 8,000 books, down from 45,000 this year. He said that to his knowledge, there is no outside source which could make up the funding.

Acid rain monitoring threatened

Paul Godfrey has been studying acid rain deposition in nearly 5,000 lakes, rivers, and streams in Massachusetts since 1983. A network of 1,000 volunteers collect samples which eventually find there way to Godfrey's research center at the University of Massachusetts.

Godfrey says there is no other project of this scope in the Northeast, and until a week ago, it appeared the research was going to be "zero-funded" next fiscal year's Massachusetts budget.

An amendemnt by Rep. Stanley Rosenberg, D-Amherst, which the house approved last week, earmarked $160,000 for acid rain research, according to Rick Taupier, assistant secretary for research at the Executive Office of Environmental Affairs.

"However, there is $500,000 worth of projects competing for that money," Taupier said.

He said that in addition to the approximately $210,000 Godfrey had received last year, Smith's research, and research on air quality in relation to acid rain, which had received about $100,000, will compete for the $160,000. He said it is unclear now how the money will be divided.

Also, because his research is partially funded by the U.S. Geological Survey, Godfrey would be able to keep some forms of research underway.

Godfrey will still be at the University next year. But if the budget passed by the Massachusetts House of Representatives clears the senate, the project he has overseen for the last six years will be effectively ended.

Godfrey said he depends on 1,000 volunteers to collect water samples. These volunteers bring the samples to one of 19 regional labs, and the samples are eventually transferred to his research center at the University.

The project is called the Acid Rain Monitoring (ARM) Project. He said he chose the acronym, ARM because each of the volunteer sticks his or her arm into the water to get a sample.

He fears that if the acid rain research is cut, however, the volunteers will lose interest. If they see that the state has little interest in funding the research, they may say, "why bother?" and give up.

"That's demoralizing," he said. "They need to know somebody cares."

He said cutting research on acid rain sends a message to the rest of the country that Massachusetts places acid rain research low on its list of priorities.

He said the U.S. would need to spend $5 billion over 10 years to eliminate the problem of acid rain, and if Massachusetts doesn't care enough to spend money on research, the rest of the country won't be willing to commit to the $5 billion.

Godfrey said that re-starting a project of this kind once it has been eliminated would be extremely difficult.

Thus far, he has determined that six percent of the surface bodies of water in Massachusetts are acidified, meaning some plant and animal life cannot survive in them.

Gun lobbyists oppose bill to ban semi-automatics

BOSTON (AP) — With an array of guns in front of him and a phalanx of police behind him, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis proposed banning semi-automatic assault weapons in a move yesterday that drew immediate criticism from gun lobbyists.

The proposal would be among the first statewide bans of its kind in the nation and would ban the sale, possession and purchase of military-type assault rifles. In a compromise aimed at gun owners, the bill would allow those who already legally own any of the banned weapons to re-register them and continue to use them under controlled circumstances.

Among the banned weapons would be AK-47 assault rifles and Uzi semi-automatic rifles.

"Military assault rifles belong on the battlefield, not creating war zones in our cities," Dukakis said. "We cannot allow our police to be outgunned and our children gunned down — caught in the cross-fire of drug wars."

Despite its compromise provisions, the legislation drew immediate criticism from gun lobbyists, including one who sat on the special commission that advised the governor during preparation of the bill.

"It's a piece of junk," said Stephen Nottonson of Safari Club International's New England chapter, who participated in the drafting of the bill. Nottonson said possibly as many as a million Bay State residents will have to re-register their weapons.

According to documents provided to Nottonson by the Massachusetts State Police Firearms Identification Section, of 880 guns involved in shootings from January 1985 through this March 19, only three were on the list of banned weapons.

Boston Police Commissioner Francis Roache, although he strongly supports the bill, said that, in Boston, "It's not a serious problem now but that's not the issue. We have to make sure is does not become an issue."

And Michael Yacino of the Gun Owners Actions League said the Dukakis bill would involve confiscation of legally purchased weapons. "What logic is it to take something away from somebody who's done nothing wrong?" Yacino said. He added that claims that the weapons on the governor's banned list are useless for hunting is "absurd."

Dukakis administration officials responded swiftly to the criticism. Press spokesman James Dorsey called Yacino's claim that legal guns would be confiscated "an absolute lie."

Owners of guns on the banned list would have 60 days to register them with the state Department of Public Safety. They would then be able to use them at licensed gun clubs and regulated shooting events such as target practise or skeet shoots.

There would be no confiscation program, but anyone caught with a weapon not legally registered would be subject to the penalties in the law.

If the Dukakis proposal becomes law, violators would face up to 5 years in prison with a 1-year mandatory term. The proposal also creates a new category of crime involving the use of an illegal weapon during the commission of a felony. If the weapon is on the banned list, a violator would face an extra five years to life in prison.

Fighting corporate bullies

Craig Berger

Although my spring break was wonderful, I couldn't help being disturbed at the start of it. As I got out of my bus at Laguardia Airport in New York and lugged my bags toward the Continental terminal where I was to catch a 1:45 flight to San Diego, I noticed a few middle-aged, middle-American men quietly pacing the terminal's entrance wearing signs which read "On Strike."

I'm writing about this because it is an upsetting and typical example of how a single wealthy businessman can master the means of employment for tens of thousands of moderate income workers without any consideration for his employees. Frank Lorenzo is playing chess with his corporation, and his blue collar pawns are the first to be sacrificed.

For those who don't know, Frank Lorenzo is the owner of Jet Capital Corporation, an ever-consuming company which controls Texas Air, Continental Airlines and Eastern Airlines. In 1983, Lorenzo claimed that Continental Airlines had gone bankrupt. What he was actually doing was breaking up the strong union which the Continental workers established. Since the airline was bankrupt, all union contracts were null and void.

According to Jim Galvin, a union aircraft serviceman for Eastern Airlines who is currently on strike, Lorenzo told the ex-Continental union workers that if they want to come back to work, they must do it without a union and earn as low as five to six dollars an hour.

Ever since his success with the Continental union, Lorenzo has been after the Eastern Airlines union. It seems that Lorenzo favors Continental because he has already established dictatorial control over its workers.

Eastern is a threat to Lorenzo because his workers have a say about their modest income and benefits. Seventeen months ago, the union offered Lorenzo a 20 pay cut. Lorenzo balked, saying that he needed them to take a 50 pay cut for Eastern's profitable shuttle system to Continental, but the courts blocked the attempt. All this was leading the Eastern workers to believe that Lorenzo's best interests were not with Eastern and that they were soon to be out of work.

Lorenzo panicked in his millions and turned to Donald Trump. The Department of Transportation has recently approved a deal for Lorenzo to sell Eastern's shuttle to the multi-millionare. The Union's fears have come to reality, and the airline they work for is being sold out, piece by piece.

This strike holds significance to the entire working class of America. Unions like the Teamsters, the AF of L and the CIO are backing the strike. Mike Doyle, a union worker for the Communications Workers of America picketed in support of the Eastern union at the Houston International Airport, "The little guy has to show that we can't be controlled by someone who doesn't care about us. It's a matter of pride."

The middle class must assert itself if it is to survive. There's a lot of extra money that is filtering upward to a few rich men like Lorenzo. In the case of Jim Galvin, he was asked to take a 50 pay cut after almost ten years of service. I spoke with a woman in Houston who was picketing on behalf of her husband who was asked for the same sacrifice after 30 years of service. This is no way to treat an honest worker.

The Eastern workers are unemployed and Lorenzo is making a great deal of money because of it. White collar thugs like Lorenzo need to learn the value of jobs and lives and its relation to money and the "big deal." The Eastern workers have been forced out of work by a corporate bully, but they, along with many other unions, are not giving up without a fight. I applaud their efforts and give them my full support.

Beware of the "student" tax

Pedro Pereira

Students beware. Taking advantage of and profiting from students is becoming an all-American institution.

The institution has become especially popular in Amherst as some town officials and residents attempt to use the students to solve financial tangles.

Nancy Maglione, the town's finance director, last semester proposed a $50 annual excise tax for the 28,000 students who live in Amherst. The tax, now on the backburner, would raise $1.4 million per year for the financially-troubled Amherst.

"I think it's appropriate for students to be paying for a part of the services rendered to them," Maglione said last month. In essence, Maglione is saying the students should pay for the town's mismanagement, which if not corrected soon could cause a financial disaster in the next decade.

Although some town officials have embraced the proposed tax, they will not see it become reality during Town Meeting in May because, according to Maglione, trying to get the tax approved now "would just be too time-consuming."

Students are safe for now, but they should begin preparing to combat the proposal — sooner than later, it will become an issue again. Should the proposal catch students off guard, the tax might just be railroaded into law.

Perhaps that is what supporters of the proposal hope will happen. They know the effectiveness of surprising students.

Last semester Town Meeting members caught students off guard when they approved a zoning bylaw that prohibited the establishment of new fraternities and sororities along North Pleasant and Phillips streets. Students in the Greek area tried in vain to prevent the re-zoning by arguing against it at Town Meeting.

Although the Greeks reacted too late, they learned the value of awareness and organization. As a result of the bylaw, nine Greek area residents are running for Town Meeting so they can protect their interests if elected next month.

The rest of the students should follow their example and start organizing. Actions such as the proposed tax, the re-zoning, and a ruling by a Hampshire District Court judge last semester will multiply if the students remain passive.

Judge Alvertus Morse in October ordered two students to pay $100 each for violating the open-container law. The money from the unusually high fine went to the town to help cover the cost of Amherst police's overtime.

The financial and zoning assaults on the students denote the town's willingness to exploit students to the fullest.

Shameful.

But the town is not alone. As recent proposals on Capitol Hill indicate, attempts to exploit students are a nationwide trend. Legislators have submitted eight versions of proposals to impose national service on high school students seeking financial aid. Should Congress approve one of the bills, students would have to "volunteer" to work in military or community service for one or two years.

Of course needy students only would have to submit themselves to national service since students whose parents can afford to pay for their education wouldn't apply for financial aid.

If the government wants to impose national service on the nation's youth, it should do so without resorting to unfair, selective laws.

And if Amherst wants to solve its financial problems, it should do so without burdening students who already have to pay high tuitions and special fees. Besides, without students the town's economy would plunge.

Ask any downtown store or bar owner.

The wrong shade of socks could kill a career

Darren Garnick

"The problem with you is that you were raised in a culture without a dress code. Back when I was in school the boys had to wear ties and shoes. Sneakers meant you were poor. You don't know how to dress like a human being."
— My mother.

My parents tried to instill the "human" method of dress into me as a child. My closet was well-stocked with the usual obnoxious kiddie clothes: a sailor suit, overalls and a NASA replica uniform. Dapper Dan, an indocrination doll designed to teach the proper use of buttons, snaps and laces, was always available.

But fashion lessons in the Garnick household did not go smoothly. I hated Dapper Dan and everything he stood for. My grudge had nothing to do with that goony smile on his face. His shiny booties are what struck a nerve.

To me, shoes are something for the Soviets. They represent a suppression of freedom, confining the toes in a rigid leather prison. I've always hated shoelaces, shoe horns and shoe polish. I still cringe whenever I pass a shoe store.

Over the years, I've managed to keep my shoephobia under control, seeking professional help only once in early 1983 (school pictures). Last week, however, I almost lost it.

During spring break, a few buddies and I decided to take a friend out to celebrate his 21st birthday. Our first nightclub stop was a brief one. The bouncer refused us entry at the door because we were wearing sneakers in a No Sneaker Zone. They were nice sneakers. They were clean sneakers. But it didn't matter. "Athletic footwear" was strictly prohibited.

My friend's sneakers were leather-crafted. The only difference between them and a genuine pair of shoes was a stripe sewn on the sides. In 1989, in the United States of America, people with the wrong style footwear are banished into exile. We were denied access to a social gathering because of someone's definition of what is fashionable.

I couldn't believe it. Rational adults were operating a business with a kindergarten mentality, saying I wasn't allowed in their tree house until I wore the official club uniform. Elitists dictate our wardrobes in a nationwide dress-code ring. I recall a similar incident a few years ago in upstate New York. A fancy hotel refused me service because I was showing too much knee. Although it was August, the sign in the lobby read: No Shorts After 6 p.m. All I wanted to do was ask directions to the nearest campground.

I ended up giving in to society and bought a pair of shoes later that week. Slipping them on for the first time, it dawned on me why elitist bars place so much emphasis on shoes. It is a shrewd arrangement set up by the textile industry to sell more socks. While white athletic socks are fine with high-top basketball sneakers, wearing them with low-cut shoes makes you look like a dork. Guys aren't used to worrying about what color socks they have on. Socks are socks.

But not anymore. It was only a matter of time before I sacrificed my morals and deliberately wore shoes. Anti-athletic job interviews demand conformity. Sweatpants are going to be replaced with suits. In this elitist, superficial world of ours, the wrong shade of socks could cost me my career.

Ironically, one of my sneaker-clad friends who got kicked out that night recently decided to accept a job with a shoe company after graduation. I'll never forgive him.

Area universities trying to link with computer network

BOSTON (AP) — A group of universities and scientific institutes is scrambling to link New England to the National Science Foundation's national supercomputer network after missing the boat by not applying to join.

"We should have had a proposal together for a New England regional network last October. But we didn't," Kent England, director of networks and systems engineering at Boston University, said yesterday.

England is a founder of an ad hoc group trying to put this region on the National Science Foundation's network of six national supercomputer centers.

The network will give thousands of scientists nationwide access to the country's most complex, costly and fast supercomputers. Eventually participation will be expanded to link university researchers with industry.

He blamed the tardiness on the fact that the universities and research institutes had no model for organizing a way to bid for linkage to the NSF system.

The individuals who run their institutions' respective computer systems were aware of the new network, but not of the requirements for joining. They eventually decided it was necessary to form a group to apply for regional participation in the national network. That effort only began last May.

But their efforts bore their first fruit last week, when the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Harvard and Boston universities announced the formation of the New England Academic and Research Network (NEARnet).

That is to be expanded in May to include Digital Equipment Corp.; Encore Computer; Thinking Machines Corp.; Bolt, Beranek and Newman; Lincoln Laboratories and Mitre Corp.

William Wulf, an assistant director of the NSF, said NEARnet will have to compete with other regional networks, particularly in the South, for a place in the national network.

"We'll be adding two more nodes next year, and Massachusetts might be one of the bidders, but there is no guarantee," Wulf said.

England said New England institutions had been tied to ARPAnet, a research computer network begun 20 years ago and financed by the US Defense Department. Now a member of the older generation of computer hook-ups nationwide, ARPAnet is being phased out this year.

"So here's a brand new network. So we're in a transition," England said.

The need to be hooked to the supercomputer centers is crucial, England said.

"It's important for us to have a regional network. It's very important for us to plug into the rest of the world. Without it, researchers in New England are going to suffer. We're just going to have to try harder to get connected."

Jazz reissues: CD wolves in sheep's clothing

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Correspondent

An incredible number of classic jazz albums have been digitally remastered and reissued during the last couple of years. Beyond its obvious benefits, this reissue boom has some serious problems.

On the positive side, it means salvation for fans looking for albums that were taken out of print long ago for reasons quite unrelated to artistic merit. Instead of combing through used record stores in hopes of finding even a beat-up copy (possibly at an exorbitant price), you can readily enjoy a brand new recording with crystal clear sound quality. Sometimes the reissues include better liner notes than the original versions; many CD reissues contain "bonus" tracks (usually outtakes from the original sessions) for more than an hour of music on one disc.

But even though the reissue boom may appear to be in the service of the music, it also represents the worst aspects of record company conservatism. Reissues are pure gold for the record compnanies lucky enough to have recorded the original sessions in the first place: they cost next to nothing to produce and their sales are practically guaranteed. There is a motherlode of Young Urban Disposable Income out there; labels such as Columbia, Atlantic, Blue Note and fantasy are all trying to lay claim to it by flooding the market with reissues that, like "new age" music (Ed. cringes in fear and loathing), satisfy two prototypical yuppie-music criteria: they are "hi-tech" (especially on CD) and "respectable." as if to underscore the cringing overcauttiousness, the companies are pricing reissues at about 25 percent lower than new releases - sometimes even less.

The problem is this: given the (accepted) theory that there is a fixed amount of record/CD-buying income out there, the big domestic labels are starving out the new artists. They learned their lessons from rock well; why worry about whether a new artist will catch on when you can release anither Doors live album?

Thus it's not surprising that most of the exciting new jazz artists are on European imports (such as Soul Note and JMT) or domestic independents (such as Sunnyside and Grmavision). The big labels aside from their sporadic, shor-lived jazz subsidiaries, concentrate on neo-traditionalists like Wynton Marsalis, who serve as "living reissues," and contemporay jazz artists like David Sanborn, who cross over to the pop market.

It is painfully obvious that these labels aren't even interested in taking chances on the few new artists they have signed by pricing reissues so much lower and making so many available they are steering consumers away from new artists. This even seems ridiculous from a business point of view: take an occasional risk by signing a new artist, then discourage people from buying his or her albums?

Overall the reissue boom is yet another manifestation of the record indusry's bottom-line myopia, made all the more insidious by its superficial veneer of obeisance to the past greats of jazz. So, next time you're in a record store and you have your heart set on that Miles or Coltrane classic on CD, go ahead and buy it because it's great music. But at least understand why it costs ten bucks and why it's there, while the new Henry Threadgill CD goes for fourteen and is out of stock.

Heavy metal: a logical approach

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Correspondent

Anticipation weighed heavy in the air of the Worcester Centrum on March 16 as the lights dimmed and Queensryche (opening for Metallica) took the stage. "Queen of the Reich", from their first EP, boomed from the amplifiers. The crowd roared, thrashed and threw their fists in the air, a response that was constant throughout the band's set.

I've always been a fan of Geoff Tate's amazing vocal talent, Chris Degarmo's and Mike Wilton's excellent guitar work, Eddie Jackson's tight bass lines and Scott Rockenfield's driving beat. However, I could never truly believe the tales told of their incredibly perfect and intense stage shows . . . now I'm a believer. Queensryche's performance was electrifying. They had the audience sufficiently whipped into a frenzy and ready for Metallica.

Who's Queensryche? Wake up. Haven't you been keeping tabs on the Dial MTV chart? The video for their song, "Eyes of a Stranger," off their latest and most successful LP Operation Minderime, has been on the chart for over a week.

It hasn't been easy for Queensryche to get even this much attention. The heavy metal quintet started in Seattle back in the early 80's. They were picked up by their present record company, Capitol-EMI, in 1983 and have so far released one EP, Queen of the Reich and 3 LP's The Warning, Rage for Order and Operation Mindcrime. Their lyrics are socially and politically oriented, especially on Mindcrime, a dramatic concept album that tells the tale of Nicki, a heroin addict who gets involved with a group plotting to overthrow the government. Guitarist Chris DeGarmo commented, "We believe in what we write about. I don't think we are really a political band. We just write about life that goes on around us, and people are catching on to what we're doing. Each album gets more and more fans into us."

One would think that after all these years of touring and churning out albums with only small but growing trickles of admiration, the band's frustration level would be at an all time peak. Not so.

"I'm hapy with what we've done so far. I mean it could be worse. If we could just keep doing what we're doing, I'll be happy. We have a lot of musical respect in the business," said Scott Rockenfield.

Asked how he feels about mediocre groups like Cinderella and Brittny Fox making it to the top and Queensryche staying behind, vocalist Geoff Tate replied, "There is room in the world for everyone - Cinderellas, Poisons, Queensryches . . . we're just trying to do things our own way and we feel very successful. Some people have larger successes quicker, and some people have smaller successes in different increments. But we'll get there. We like what we do and we're in it for the long term."

Queensryche shares a disadvantage with another heavy metal quintet, Helloween. It's difficult for them to catch on to the metal crowd in a big way since they are not hard and fast enough for the majority of the thrash audience, and too complex for the majority of the commercial audience. Asked if they would employ tactics to win both audiences over, Tate responded, "We want to establish an audience of our own."

One advantage of being a band with an audience smaller than say, Metallica, is that they get the chance to play small clubs as well as arenas. Tate likes that.

"Any one same thing for too long gets a little tedious. It's nice to mix them up," he said.

On a final note, DeGarmo lends this bit of advice to up an coming bands, "Write your own songs, practice hard, don't give up and rage for order."

Mexican fare in slow motion

By TRACEY CEURVELS
Collegian Correspondent

La Cazuela
Northampton

La Cazuela was voted Best Mexican Restaurant in the valley by the Valley Advocate. Perhaps it is the best in the Valley, but it is certainly not one of the better Mexican restaurants I've been to. Located at 7 Old South Street in Northampton, La Cazuela is situated in an old white building whose present function is as an apartment complex. The inside of the restaurant is also white and is tastefully decorated in southwestern Aztec style. There are wall hangings and other objects of this style which together with the simplicity of the dining room give the feeling of an authentic Mexican cafe.

While at the restaurant, I learned that La Cazuela is the word for an earthen-ware cooking pot, used in Mexican kitchens. This pot, (according to the back of the menu) symbolizes the restaurant's cooking style.

About fifteen minutes after we sat down, the waitress finally approached us. She brought over homemade nacho chips with mild and hot salsa. Only when asked did she bring glasses of water. The nachos make an excellent snack, but cost extra if you want a second serving.

Ten minutes after we finished our appetizer, the waitress took our order. La Cazuela has a full bar, and offers such drinks as Margaritas and Tequila Sunrises ($3.00), Bloody Marias ($2.50) and an assortment of special coffee drinks like the Cafe Mexicano ($3.00) which includes tequila, kahlua and coffee, and is topped with whipped cream. Five Mexican beers are offered, and there are also two house wines, which can be ordered by the glass or the carafe.

For appetizers one can order anything from Nachos Grande to ceviche, which is a spicy mixture of fresh bay scallops. There is a delicious tortilla soup consisting of tomato soup topped with tortilla chips and monteray jack cheese. This can be ordered by the cup or the bowl. Chili and various salads are also offered.

As my main dish I had fajitas ($9.50) which are strips of beef sauteed with red peppers, onions and various spices. The meal was good but I've had much better elsewhere. I also sampled the enchiladas casera, which is three different enchiladas; cheese, chicken and beef, topped with chili sauce, sour cream and tomtillo sauce for $7.25. Some, but not all, of the entrees came with La Cazuela's house salad. I must say that although the salad looked quite bland (lettuce, a few radishes and olives), it was very tasty because of the house vinaigrette, which was absolutely delicious - one of the best I've ever tasted.

Desserts were simple and few. All that was offered was a scoop of Herrell's ice cream, Kahlua mousse or sopapillas, which to me was nothing more than fried dough with honey poured over it.

The food was good, however it wasn't great. The service was less than outstanding. Drinks took 15 minutes, salads were slow in arriving and dessert took almost thirty minutes. I must add that it wasn't even busy when I dined there. Perhaps the food wasn't suitable to my taste, so you may want to try it for yourself. But expect to be patient with the service.

If Queensryche becomes a household name, Tate says he will handle it, "Like I handle it now, try to be one on one with everyone. It's all you can do really."

With the success of their recent video on MTV, their tour with Metallica and the possibility of a film version of Operation Mindcrime, Queensryche could just make it big. Just listen.

■ snowball fight

An Amherst student had to undergo emergency surgery after he was hit in the eye after an estimated 1,500 to 2,000 University of Massachusetts students marched to the private college to engage about 400 to 500 Amherst students this December, contended Amherst attorney David Kaplan.

But when Kaplan suggested he forbid students of both schools from throwing snowballs at each other, Murphy's only comment was "Oh, goodness."

Dierdre Heatwole, an attorney for UMass, said the university's code of student conduct prohibits students from throwing snowballs in a malicious manner.

But she maintained that the university should not be held responsible for the unauthorized actions of its students. Students "are adults free to travel and associate in the Amherst environs," she said, adding the university "cannot, and should not, he held legally responsible for the activities of its students in their off-campus life."

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Your creative talents and powerful imagination spur you on to new and greater accomplishments. The only problem: you could encounter jealousy. Mate is unusually supportive. Avoid rocking the boat.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Be more willing to share the spotlight with partner, and the two of you will reap larger financial rewards. Too many good times could be expanding your waistline. Show self-discipline.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You need to push your pet projects and get them headed in the proper direction. Deception is possible. Be especially alert where legal contracts are concerned. Consult experts before signing anything.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Go over records with a fine-toothed comb to catch any errors or miscalculations. Your zeal will impress an authority figure who wants you on his team. Romance looks rosy. Be gentle.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Financial matters are in the spotlight and deal with them unemotionally. A real estate transaction needs careful scrutiny. Read the fine print so-meone may be trying to mislead you. Ask probing questions.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): If you settle down, you can wrap up a work assignment in no time. A surprising message from someone at a distance gets your evening off to a lovely start. You meet new faces.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You should be sitting pretty. Do not rest on your laurels, however. A publicity blitz could throw you off. Attention can be heady but misleading. Get back on track quickly!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): An escapist urge may be very strong. Be practical and complete your work first. When you seek quiet surroundings, fresh thoughts pour forth. A platonic relationship intensifies. Avoid making long-term commitments.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You are justly proud of your efforts. Friends appear and give you a joyous respite from your labors. Avoid asking for special favors; they are unlikely to be granted at this time.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Adroit behind-the-scenes maneuvering will enhance your prestige or help your business interests. If you have a hunch about promoting a project, follow it up. Join business and social clubs.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Avoid arguing with someone about a matter that is best kept under wraps. Good timing is an essential part of your career formula. A romantic encounter gets postponed. Be patient.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Try to offset the stresses and strains of current events. Wait until mid-afternoon to further your own personal aims or romantic interests. Someone influential gives you a sympathetic hearing. Make the most of it!

meets on the bar during the regular season. But part of that Johnson felt was not his team's fault. He cited the judging as hurting the Minutemen in that event.

"The only expectation that we didn't fulfill this year was getting more individuals in the finals at the EIGL Championships," Johnson said.

The Minutemen did leave their mark however before leaving the championships. Three individuals did not go unnoticed. Those were senior co-captains Bart Balocki and John Eggers along with freshman Calvin Booker.

In the all-around competition Balocki finished fourth, Booker fifth, and Eggers sixth. In an eight team field those are pretty impressive individual performances. All three of those guys were an integral part of the Minutemen's lineup this past season and they will be next year.

Balocki and Eggers (who finished third in the EIGL on still rings) both have one year of eligibility remaining. Eggers did not miss qualifying for the NCAA Championships which is the biggest meet in the country. Johnson feels that both Balocki and Eggers have a shot to qualify for the NCAA's next season and is encouraging them to go down and take a look at this year's NCAA's in Nebraska if possible just to get a feel for it.

"I think if some of the older guys could see an NCAA Championship it would show them that they are not far off, one or two skills," Johnson said.

Booker as a freshman immediately earned a spot in the starting lineup before the start of the season. The Dorchester product did not disappoint one bit, taking over as one of UMass' top all-arounders.

"I think the sky's the limit for Cal," Johnson said. "We have to strengthen him up so he can hold his crosses. A good strength program over the spring should help that."

There were not many surprises for Johnson this year. Coming into the season, he knew he had a very good team and it would not be long before the Minutemen proved just how good they would be.

On February 18 the Minutemen went into a meet with Temple needing a win to hold on to second place in the league. The Minutemen had their best meet of the year that day at the Boyden Gymnastics Center, breaking the old school record for team score of 267.25 with a 268.05. Based on that performance a pretty solid argument could be made that this year's squad was the best ever at UMass.

"I think it's the best team we've ever had here at UMass but it's very hard to compare with the teams that were here 10, 15 years ago because the sport has changed so much," a modest Johnson said. "We've been through three sets of rule changes and several equipment improvements."

Some essential ingredients of that team will be lost to graduation this year. The Minutemen will lose four of their starters, three of whom were team MVP's in three separate years and another who is their top pommel horse gymnast.

Senior Tim Myers is all done after becoming UMass' top all-around performer the last two years and team MVP last season.

Roberto Weil, who was the 1987 MVP, and also an all-arounder will also leave with perhaps the most talent of the group.

Jay Ronayne, UMass top vaulter and horizontal bar swinger, who was the 1986 team MVP leaves after an injury plagued final season.

Joe Fitzgerald has only competed in one event for the Minutemen over the past two years but he has been UMass' best on the pommel horse.

"I think it could hurt when you lose that many seniors," Johnson said. "But hopefully Tom Wolkner will be able to fill in."

Wolkner was a freshman this past season and did not see much action but Johnson has high hopes for him. Another freshman that did not see much time but who Johnson is hoping will help make up for the loss of the seniors is Bill Sayman.

And more help is on the way as Johnson has landed a blue chip recruit in Steve Christensen who was the top high school all-around gymnast in the state of New Jersey this year.

And there are a few other guys who will be leaving that have been members of the team but who have not competed much over the past four years. John Langan, who was the team's announcer and who Johnson praised for his help around the gym will hang it up along with Greg McCall.

And one guy that will be sorely missed is assistant coach Steve Clancy. Clancy has been with UMass for the past 3½ years while he has worked on his masters degree in exercise science but will be graduating this year and retiring as a UMass assistant.

Winning is not everything to Johnson though. The third place finish at the EIGL's was tied for the highest finish ever in UMass history there. If UMass had its best performance at the Championships, it could have finished second instead of fourth, maybe even first. Johnson puts everything into perspective and considers himself lucky, looking at a team like the UMass men's basketball team this past year, to coach such a nice bunch of guys, he has said on many occasions this year.

"Out of my 11 years, this was our best performance and the best set of guys I've coached and I'm looking forward to improving next year," Johnson said.

their players."

The attack is mostly a veteran unit and it showed as the Minutemen passed the ball around the net a lot, sometimes too much though and that gave the opposing defense the opportunity to step in and stop the play.

"In the Loyola and the Maryland game we just turned the ball over too many times," Bossio said. "We got position in our attacking end, we created scoring opportunities but we couldn't get the open stick. We either made a bad pass or we completed the pass but the person going to shoot got double-teamed and turned it over."

Junior Sue Murphy picked right up where she left off last year as the team scoring leader by netting nine goals and dishing out five assists in the three games. Senior co-captain Cathy Fuhrman has chipped in nine goals and two assists.

Fuhrman netted six in the season opener and Murphy four but in their next few games production fell off a little. Finishing off plays could be a key to tomorrow's game.

Sue Murphy leads the Gazelles in scoring into today's game against Yale.

"We didn't take as many shots as I would have liked in the last two games," Bossio said. "We're trying to set up sometimes for almost a perfect shot and that's not going to happen. The attack needs to recognize a lot sooner when they can go one-on-one, when they can take their player which we've been working on. Sometimes their just a little too slow to think."

They will have to think today if they want to beat Yale goalie Catherine Sharkey. Sharkey has been tough to crack in this early stage of the season. She has stopped 58 shots and her goals- against average stands at just below six a game.

"I want to make sure that we're taking our shots when they're available and that we're being poised in front of the goal, not rushing our shots," Bossio said.

Sophomore goaltender Elizabeth Keats will get the call for UMass today. Keats has looked pretty good, making some big saves for the Gazelles since taking over the position uncontested this season. She has given up 27 goals in three games.

The defense will have to keep its eye on Lisa Dubbs who leads Yale with 11 goals and six assists to date. Amy Whitaker (9, 1) is another player that UMass will have to contain.

"I want to see our defense play just like they did in the Maryland game," Bossio said. "Just to continue to be aggressive and go to the ground balls first and be tenacious, deny their player the ball. The one thing we need to do a lot more of defensively is denying our player the ball, especially the midfield."

The Gazelles learned some of that over the break from a couple of nationally ranked teams and will need to correct it today if they wish to even up their record.

"I think it was better to have played some strong teams so that they know what their up against and how much work they have to do."

The Gazelles will have a couple of hours of work to do today.

■ Boggs-Rose

ROSE: "That's exactly what I'm gonna do."

BOGGS: "Yes sir. Even when they keep asking you if you really did sell the ball and bat you used to break Ty Cobb's record to pay off gambling debts, just keep saying 'No comment.' . . . Hey, you didn't really sell that ball, did you?"

ROSE: "No comment."

BOGGS: "Ha! That's good, Pete. Perfect. Keep saying it just like that and this situation will just dissolve before ya know it. Then you'll have no reason to worry about not being voted into the Hall of Fame in '92."

ROSE: "Four thousand, two hundred, fifty-six hits. Two thousand, two hundred runs. That's the only comment I'm gonna have."

BOGGS: "Yeah, that's it. You'll shake this gambling scandal right off. . . . Of course, if that doesn't work, you could always get a spot on '20/20' with Barbara Walters. That could be a big help to you."

ROSE: "You think so?"

BOGGS: "Oh, yeah. An interview with her could really clear your image. . . . And you know what? You might even get lucky — heh, heh, if you know what I mean."

ROSE: "Really?! Did you . . . With Barbara Walters?"

BOGGS: "No! Pete, I'm a new man now. I've sworn I'd be faithful to my wife. But, heh, if Debbie wasn't at the interview with me, and if I really wanted to . . . Me and Barbara — you know it could have happened!"

■ UMass-Cornell take to the Hill today

It's a whole new season now, but seeing the Big Red roll off the UMass win and into the national championship game (losing to Syracuse) has to have some kind of effect on the Gorillas.

"Some of the kids feel that way, but I never do," said UMass coach Dick Garber. "I just look at it as a game, whether you in or lose."

Well, today is not just any game. It's the first home game for the Gorillas in 1989, and yes, Cornell just happens to be the opponent. How convenient.

The Hill will be alive with the sound of lax this afternoon (3 p.m.), and the Big Red could pose one of the toughest challenges of the year for UMass.

Coming into the game, Cornell is 4-0, having beaten Cortland, Amry, Harvard and New Hampshire, and is ranked seventh in the latest United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association poll. And as a traditional national power, Cornell has become a big rival for the Gorillas.

One can trace back to last year around this time, when the Gorillas traveled to Ithaca, NY and battled Cornell through five overtimes before Tim Soudan's goal lifted his team to an 8-7 win.

Garber isn't ruling out a similar game today.

"It should be a real barnburner. I'm hoping for a good day," he said, although there is possibility of rain.

Regardless, the two teams have a lot of similarities which could make for a great 60 minutes (or maybe more . . .)

"They play the same style as us, with key offensive players and tough defense," Garber said.

Among those key offensive players is senior attack Steve Meyer, who leads the team through four games in scoring with 17 goals and six assists. Next are junior midfielders Vince Angotti, with three goals and 11 assists, and Bill O'Hanlon (11-2). O'Hanlon had six goals in the playoff game last year, but could be used more on attack this season because of his explosive tendencies, according to Garber.

Leading the defense is senior goalkeeper Paul Schimoler, a player whom Garber tried to land at UMass out of high school. Schimoler is yielding just 5.7 goals per game with a .679 save percentage. Garber considers him "one of the best in the country."

Schimoler also has a strong defensive wall in front of him, one which might put a serious crimp in the Gorillas' plans to run, run, and run some more.

"Their pressure defense won't let you rest. The key to the game will be how our attack reacts to the pressure," Garber said.

However, UMass has a decent defense of its own, led by All-America senior goalkeeper Sal LoCascio. Thus far, LoCascio has allowed four goals with 14 saves in two games for a .778 save percentage.

The Gorillas will be hard-pressed to duplicate the scoring production they got on last week's Spring Break jaunt to the West. They amassed 81 goals on the trip, mostly against inexperienced competition. But the Big Red are by no means inexperienced, and UMass could be in for a real tug-of-war.

But if there is one thing that UMass has going for it, it is the depth of the team, especially in the front lines.

The game plan is pretty obvious that the Gorillas will have to stop players like O'Hanlon, Meyer and Angotti, but Garber doesn't think Cornell's job will be quite that simple.

"We hope our depth will wear them down," Garber said. "They could focus on players like [Scott] Hiller or [Jim] McAleavey, but then [Paul] Ganci, or [Rob] Codignotto, or Soudan or [Mike] Cain could have a big day. We're not a one- or two-man team."

And with the Gorillas able to shuttle players in and out without much drop-off of talent, that is where Cornell could have a hard time keeping up.

No matter, it should be another classic match-up between two of the nation's top teams. A perfect way to kick off the home season.

Scott Hiller and the Gorillas will look to avenge last year's playoff loss to Cornell today at The Hill.

Just a reminder . . .

Just a reminder that no student will be admitted to this afternoon's, or any UMass lacrosse game at the Boyden Hill without a valid student ID.

Entrance is located at the gate at the north end of the field near Tobin Hall. Admission price for all non-students, as well as students without an ID is $4.

and the mental errors killed us."

After a sacrifice fly by Glen DiSarcina made it 7-5, Donovan blooped a double inches inside the leftfield line to score two more runs and tie it.

An inning later, Bright homered to left to give UMass its first lead, but one it couldn't hold.

"All we had to do was get people out and we didn't do it," Stone said.

Sal Tinnerello made sure of that.

Baseball drops home opener to UConn

Two-run homer in ninth provides 10-8 victory

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

Last season, the University of Massachusetts baseball team had a secure hold on the University of Connecticut, winning both games of the season series.

This year, many of the faces on both teams are different and, as fans at Lorden Field found out yesterday, so were the results.

Sal Tinnerello hit two home runs to lead UConn to a 10-8 win over the Minutemen. Tinnerello got in the final word with a two-run homer in the top of the ninth, after the Minutemen had come back from a five-run deficit to take an 8-7 lead.

"The momentum kept changing," UConn coach Andy Baylock said. "We had it for most of the game and then it swung back when they tied it up."

UMass coach Mike Stone said, "It was a lousy loss. We had the chance to win, but we couldn't get anybody out."

UMass pitchers had a difficult time with Tinnerello all afternoon, as the freshman leftfielder went 3 for-4 and drove in four runs.

In the ninth, Tinnerello stepped up against UMass reliever Jeff Richardson with a man on first and knocked Richardson's offering over the right field fence to improve UConn's record to 8-6 and make the Minutemen 5-6.

"I just felt real good at the plate today," Tinnerello said. "I'm normally the designated hitter, so playing left field was a change. But I'm just trying to stay consistent. I saw some good pitches today."

Stone said of the home run, "It was one bad pitch. He was trying to put a slider in on his hands and he didn't get it far enough inside."

Richardson was the third pitcher Tinnerello had faced, after middle reliever Jerry Creamer and starter Dave Telgheder.

Telgheder lasted just 4 and⅔ innings, allowing eight hits and five runs.

"I was disappointed with Dave," Stone said. "We need to get more out of him."

The Huskies got to Telgheder for a run in the third, and RBIs in the fourth by Tinnerello and UConn starter Tim Cain made it 3-1.

In the fifth, a single and an RBI double were enough to chase Telgheder. Tinnerello then greeted Creamer by putting his second pitch over the fence in right center to make it 6-1.

UMass scored on a run-scoring single by Brian Donovan in the fifth, but the Huskies answered with another run in the sixth to expand their lead to 7-2.

"We didn't execute on defense or offense," Stone said.

But the Minutemen put together enough offense in the bottom of the fifth to tie the score.

Drew Comeau, who already holds the UMass career home run record, blasted his 24th over the left field fence to start things off.

One out later, Mike Chambers was hit by a pitch and freshman Brian Bright followed with a single. After Cain hit Kevin Correa with a pitch, UConn third baseman Ken Coffee made a mental mistake to help the Minutemen.

Derek Dann hit a slow grounder to third, and instead of taking the out at third or getting the sure out at first, Coffee threw home. The throw was late, the run scored, and the bases remained loaded.

"That was one of five mental errors we made," Baylock said. "We had a five-lead

Gazelles face Yale in home opener

Women's lacrosse looks forward to Totman after 1-2 road trip

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Like many of the students around here that hit the road for spring break to Daytona or the Bahamas, the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team also booked a few reservations for last week.

The Gazelles trekked over to New York for a date with Hofstra University and then headed south to take on national powers Maryland and Loyola. However, it was not all fun in the sun for UMass.

UMass will gladly return home for its home opener today, an encounter with Yale University (3 p.m., Totman Field).

They handled Hofstra pretty easily, a 16-11 win which was not even as close as the score indicates according to UMass coach Patti Bossio. That game was on March 19. The Gazelles were given three days to catch their breath before getting back on the highway to Maryland for back-to-back games with Loyola and the University of Maryland.

Loyola quickly assured that UMass would not have an undefeated year as they handed the Gazelles their first setback of the year. UMass apparently found the Loyola defense a little tougher to penetrate than in the Hofstra game, scoring just six goals to drop a 12-6 decision.

The Gazelles had to regroup right away though for a game less than 24 hours later with Maryland. The Terrapins pulled out a defensive struggle over a tired UMass team, 8-4 to leave the Gazelles with a 1-2 vacation.

Now it's time for the Gazelles to return home. Yale University (3-2) will have to do the traveling tomorrow. The Bulldogs however may have as much playing time at Totman in game situations as many of the Gazelles. UMass is a freshman oriented team, with six rookies in the starting lineup, five of them on defense. Which means that a majority of UMass' squad has not seen a minute of playing time in game situations on their home field.

But the first year players have had three games of college ball now and Bossio has seen some good signs, notably the man-to-man defense which did a good job in shutting down Maryland.

"In the Maryland game it seemed to come together," Bossio said. "The defense was so much more aggressive, they were talking, they were helping, they were tight on

Fourth at EIGLs a tough finish to successful men's gymnastics year

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

In sports like gymnastics and track sometimes it can be a darn shame that the season is measured by the last meet of the season.

The 1989 season for the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team is a good example of a team that had one heck of a year during the regular season but then because of injuries and maybe just an off day finished a disappointing fourth at the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League Championships.

For most of the league, that will be the meet that it remembers.

The final standings in the regular season for the EIGL went the United States Naval Academy, Temple University and then UMass for the 1-2-3 places. Those were the final standings including the league championships.

Two weekends ago, the Minutemen went into the EIGL's in the second position with a 6-1 record in the league. Their only loss of the year had been to Navy in the first meet of the year down in Annapolis, Md.

UMass coach Roy Johnson felt that his gymnasts were in a position to maybe surprise Navy and take home the EIGL Championship for the first time in the team's 26 years in the EIGL.

But then during the week before practice, Jay Ronayne injured tendons in his foot while attempting a vault. Ronayne competed at the EIGL's but was not even close to his normal self swinging on the high bar where he scored just an 8.35. Ronayne had been hitting nines or better all year. That was one major blow to the Minutemen. Ronayne was also the Minutemen's top vaulter.

"He was plagued with that bad foot which didn't help him to train," Johnson said. "He practiced but not real well the week before."

That hurt UMass' score which at 261.45 was a good six to seven points lower than they had scored in the previous few weeks. Another reason though, was that the Minutemen just had a bad day at the wrong time.

Johnson's squad had an uncharacteristic four falls on the pommel horse. They also did not score well on the horizontal bar where they had pulled out a couple of big

A call of thanks at the hot corner

Wade Boggs didn't make it to last week's Grapefruit League game between Boston and Cincinnati. However, before the exhibition, he gave Pete Rose a call to thank him for switching some of the press' attention from his sex scandal to Rose's gambling scandal. What follows is their conversation, which was secretly recorded with the help of a Red Sox player (whose name will not be revealed) who bugged the phone.

Bob Bobala

BOGGS: "Hello, Pete? This is Wade Boggs."
ROSE: "Wade?! How's it going?"
BOGGS: "Pretty well now — thanks to you."
ROSE: "Oh, don't mention it."
BOGGS: "No, really, Pete. I want to thank you for taking some of the heat off me. The press has really zeroed in on you and this gambling thing. It's got all those reporters off my back."
ROSE: "No problem, Wade. Us ballplayers got to help each other out whenever we can you know. Besides, I don't believe a word of what Ms. Adams says anyway — especially the part about how you don't like me because I'm the type of player you'll never be."
BOGGS: "It's all lies. All lies, Pete."
ROSE: "I know it is, Wade. . . . But, you know, you really would have no reason not to like me anyway. I never used to intentionally hustle on the field anymore than someone like you. Honest, I don't know how I got the name 'Charlie Hustle.' I was just a little more hyperactive than your average ballplayer."
BOGGS: "Oh, I know, Pete. I imagine that betting on greyhounds and the like as much as you do would make anybody hyperactive anyway. But I know that you're completely innocent of all these rumors about you betting on baseball."
ROSE: "Of course I am. The heaviest thing I'm into is bingo at my parish back home. The press has just blown it all out of proportion."
BOGGS: "That's just what happened to me. Those reporters just kept pressing me and pressing me. Before I knew it, the pressure became so great that I was telling them things that weren't true just to please them — like when I said that I was addicted to sex, as if I had some disease or something. I'm not addicted to sex, Pete."
ROSE: "And nor am I addicted to gambling."
BOGGS: "That's right. And don't you let them pressure you into saying that you are. You just keep saying 'No comment.'"

Spill experts left Exxon, report says

By SONNI SFRON
Associated Press

Exxon Corp. was without some of its senior experts on oil spills when one of its tankers struck a reef and began leaking 11 million gallons of oil into pristine Alaskan waters.

At least nine oil spill experts, including the company's senior environmental officer, left Exxon in 1985 and 1986 during an industry slump when the company was trying to reduce its workforce, according to a specialist in oil spill pollution.

The report comes amid criticisms that Exxon's response to the massive oil spill Friday in Price William Sound has been too slow.

But Exxon Co. USA spokesman Les Rogers said the company is confident it has the expertise it needs to tackle the spill. In addition to its own staff, he said, those who have retired are readily available and the company has already tapped two former employees as consultants.

"One went up on the first plane," from Houston to Alaska on Friday, Rogers said.

The nine employees were experts in either oil spill research or oil spill response, Richard S. Golob, publisher of Golob's Oil Pollution Bulletin, said yesterday.

"Some of these people were internationally recognized experts in their field," Golob said.

Seven of the experts left five different Exxon subsidiaries and affiliates in 1986 during an industry wide slump, when Exxon and other oil companies offered retirement incentives in order to reduce their workforces, Golob said.

An eighth expert in oil spill response departed in 1985, and a ninth departed either in 1985 or 1986, he said.

Golob said it was not clear whether the departures had any effect on the company's ability to respond quickly to the accident. But he said, "It might be a contributing factor because they do not have the same experience cadre of oil spill professionals that they had prior to the 1986 early retirement offer.

"This is not just an Exxon problem. It's an industry-wide problem," he added.

"A person can take a crisis management course and then a refresher course and then another refresher course, but experience is the best teacher," Golob said, noting that less experienced employees would be unlikely to have dealt with a major spill, let alone one that size of the Valdez disaster.

A spokeswoman for an environmental group said that departures raise a red flag.

"It would be troubling if the company did not replace these people with equally knowledgeable spill response personnel," said Lisa Speer, senior staff scientist with the

Festa named in scandal

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association members were stunned last night by the release of information appearing to substantiate claims of nearly $1,500 in financial improprieties connected to Jay Festa, former president of the Commuter Area Government.

Festa, who resigned in early March and subsequently dropped out of the University, is being investigated by the Dean of Students office for financial impropriety allegations including the question of whether he was a full time student when he served as president.

SGA Treasurer Laura Filkins released a report detailing what she called "a gross misuse of money" and cited Festa as being largely responsible for the pilfering.

The report exposed purchases including $245 for computer games, $179.90 for a refrigerator, $150 in magic markers, $139.95 for an answering machine, $99.95 for a "double boom box" radio, and $64.47 for a coffee maker. All appliances, which Filkins said were a "blatant luxury," are used in the CAG office.

"When every other RSO is suffering for funds and the Commuter Area Government buys a boom box, it's extravagant," she said.

Also discovered were personal expenses made by Jay Festa including the purchase of a $45 copicard, two books at $34, an address book at $5.25, and assorted purchases of Nuprin and Tylenol medicines and Newsweek and Time magazines.

A batik tapestry costing $35 was also purchased and money from the revenue account, which consists of additional monetary intake from programming, was used to purchase $307.50 worth of framed artwork from International Galleries. Several other purchases including, $187.50 paid to Nuttleman's Florist and $151.37 to Stop and Shop are under investigation because their purposes are unknown, Filkins said.

Many senators who supported Festa during the controversy said they feel betrayed by the former president's actions: "I supported Jay, and sometimes I feel sorry that I did," said Sen. Bud Verge. "I feel like I was let down, I had no idea it was this extensive."

Sen. Robert Fadel, former Senate Speaker, said "Some of the expenses are shocking. The most frightening thing is that most of them [members of the CAG] were not aware of the misuse."

Greeks to sponsor student's run for brain tumor research

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

A brain tumor took Seth Feldman's life last December. The Dartmouth College freshman left his money to the Brain Tumor fund at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute, where he was treated, and for which he spoke at numerous benefits.

Mike Silverstein wanted to do more.

The Harvard University freshman, a friend of Feldman's, said he will run in the 93rd Boston Marathon, scheduled for April 17. For every one of the 26.2 miles he runs, money will be raised for brain tumor research.

Jeff Glassman, a University of Massachusetts junior finance major who went to summer camp with Silverstein and Feldman, said he wanted to aid one friend's efforts to raise money in memory of another friend.

"Seth was a friend of mine," Glassman said. "I'm doing this to help Mike Silverstein create a network of sponsorships so that brain cancer research can continue and so that tragedies such as Seth's can be prevented in the future."

At a Greek Council meeting Tuesday night, Glassman, treasurer of the Interfraternity Council, asked council members to help sponsor Silverstein's marathon run. The council voted unanimously in favor of the proposal.

"The council members are individually collecting pledges from their respective houses," Glassman said. The Greek Council will also match up to $300 in the name of the fraternity or sorority that raises the most money, he said.

Glassman said council members were also encouraged to take pledges from others in the University community.

"I'd like to set a goal of $2,000. I think that a three or five dollar donation from students is not much to ask for such a worthy cause," he said.

In a letter to the council, Silverstein wrote of his friend's courage:

"Until the day that Seth Feldman died, not once did he feel sorry for himself. When I spoke to Seth shortly before he died, he told me to be brave, not to be sad, and to make his bed whenever I came to visit his family and slept in his room — he never lost his sense of humor. And he never lost his thoughtful consideration for others, his selflessness, and his will to battle cancer."

"Although Seth's battle is over, his memory is still as strong as was his desire to overcome his cancer," he wrote. "His only wish was that this desire, shared by so many other cancer patients, may become a reality for those facing the same disease as he."

Glassman said council members plan to collect pledges in campus dormitories later this week. He said a table may be set up on the Campus Center Concourse next week. Pledges will be taken until April 17, he said.

Demonstrators opposed to any gun control bills by the Massachusetts legislature turned out at the Statehouse in Boston yesterday to voice their opposition to any banning of semi-automatic weapons.

Gun activists sit in on House

BOSTON (AP) — At least 1,000 pro-gun demonstrators jammed a Statehous auditorium yesterday to oppose a slate of gun control bills while the governor and top legislative leaders push for limits on hand guns and assault weapons.

The demonstrators came by bus from gun club and rifle ranges around the state in a show of political force that went far toward explaining why the gun lobby on Beacon Hill is so formidable.

"We're just trying to put our point across that criminals are doing all the bad work a usual and banning these guns is not going to do anything," said Craig Marquis of Salem, who came by bus from the Danvers Fish & Game Club.

The line from the gun owners was the same as in past years: Get rough on crime, not on law-abiding sportsmen.

UMass hires teachers for five departments

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

The humanities and fine arts are surviving the budget crunch, adding new faculty and trying to expand existing services despite financial constraints, said Dean Murray Schwartz.

Speaking at a meeting for all humanities and fine arts department heads, Schwartz said new faculty have been added to the departments of art, Japenese, English, German and history and that the linguistics department will be hiring two new faculty members next year.

"We're not dead in the water as you can see," Schwartz said. "Despite all the rather odd zigs and zags of the budget we continue to add faculty."

Schwartz also said the amount operating budget reversion being asked for by the Provost from all schools and colleges "has been going down daily because of our special needs."

The special needs referred to are the general education requirements all students must fulfill in order to graduate and which are provided by the humanities and fine arts.

Even though the budget crisis is hurting departments and 13 faculty are still needed and cannot be hired, people should not let the strides of current faculty members go unnoticed, Schwartz said.

"We should all take pause to note the achievements of faculty," he said listing some of the latest accomplishments of individual faculty and departments such as the eight books published by the history department last month and a new exchange program with Lenningrad Poly-Tech in the Soviet Union which UMass Poly-Tech initiated.

He said also that a number of departments on campus are "being watched very carefully and imitated [by other colleges and universities] around the country."

On the down side Schwartz said the state budget that has come out of the House only restores the $5 million reversion taken last December and does not take into effect upcoming contract negotiations with union members or a 53rd pay week at the end of this year.

"We don't know what the fate of the final version will be. But when you add all the elements together, we're sort of just hanging on," he said.

Vigil to be held for activist

Several University of Massachusetts students plan to hold a vigil this morning to protest the jailing of Salvadoran peace activist America Sosa.

Sosa, the United States representative for COMDRES, the committee of the Mothers of the Disappeared of El Salvador, was arrested Monday in Washington by Immigration and Naturalization officials, according to the COMDRES headquarters there.

The vigil, run by the Central American Solidarity Association, is scheduled for 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. on the steps of the Student Union.

CASA member Greg Smith said the Bush administration has singled out Sosa because she opposes US policy towards El Salvador.

"This shows just how ridiculous the political asylum in this country is. It's clear if she's sent back to El Salvador, she'll be arrested by the government and killed by a death squad," Smith said.

Sosa, who has been applying for political asylum in the United States for close to four years, has spoken at UMass twice. In her lectures, she told of what it is like to live in "constant fear in a country where 10,000 people have disappeared — abducted and murdered by right wing death squads."

Prof speaks of oppressed, becoming ally

By RICHARD A. BOUCHER JR.
Collegian Correspondent

Being a victim of discrimination helps one become an ally of oppressed or minority groups, Michael Wolff, an English professor at the University of Massachusetts, said yesterday.

Wolff, who teaches "Man and Women in Literature" and founded a faculty support group for gays, lesbians, and bisexuals, spoke yesterday about "Dilemmas of being a Male Feminist" at the Women's Studies Brown Bag Lunch series.

Before Wolff came to America from England's Cambridge University, he faced discrimination in a private secondary school during World War II because he is Jewish, he said.

He said that having been discriminated against gives him power to accept a label like "Male Feminist."

His wife's local work for feminist issues and her helping to found the Everywoman's Center helped him sympathize with the women's movement, he said, because he realized discrimination against him gave him something in common with all people who are discriminated against.

Wolff's discussion with more than 50 people focused on what he called, "Coalition Politics." People who belong to a group that is not historically oppressed can still be allies to the women's movement and other causes, he said.

"Be an ally. Put yourself in the way of those experiences which happen to those people who don't have to do anything to have [the experiences of discrimination] happen," said Wolff.

Allies may have to deal with an intial mistrust, however, because they may not necessarily belong to that group, and therefore, don't have to come under fire from opposition, an audience member noted.

Official: abuse can be seen

Health coordinator tells how teachers recognize drug problems

By ALETHEA O'DONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

Alcohol and drug abuse among students is a problem affecting America's teachers, a University Health Services official said Tuesday night, but students and teachers have ways of discovering and offsetting this problem.

Deidre Scott, coordinator of the UHS Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program, spoke about the problem at a seminar sponsored by the University of Massachusetts chapter of the Music Educators National Conference.

She said "a constellation of factors" help a teacher recognize a student with a substance abuse problem. She said teachers are "fact finders" who can pick up on certain symptoms to identify an abusing student.

She said several signs of abuse are evident: "Very abrupt mood swings, a change in friends, a change in physical appearance, a chronic cough, or a general lack of not taking responsibility when they used to are all typical things you might see or hear," she said.

Teachers can also overhear students talking about parties, drunken students or black outs, which are all indicators of an abuse problem, Scott said.

"A teacher must ask themselves if all these things happen at once," she said. "It is really tough [to discover a true abuse problem] because you need a lot of pieces and you have to be very observant."

Marisa Weinstein, a UMass graduate student and co-host of the seminar told of an experience she had as a teacher when she discovered one of her students had p

Group to lobby for Soviet Jewry

By MONICA ROBERTO
Collegian Correspondant

A University of Massachusetts human rights group plans to lobby in Washington April 5 and 6 for the plight of Soviet Jews.

"Our main focus is to get the Jews out of the Soviet Union," said Jason Kofman, chairperson of the UMass Coalition for Soviet Jewry.

Karl W. Ryavec, political science professor at UMass, said, "Historically, Russia has not been a home for the Jews until the 1700s when Russia invaded Poland. Because of this and the nationalistic appeals to the Soviet people by Josef Stalin, there are prejudices against [Jews] in the society at large."

According to Ryavec, the emigration rate of Soviet Jews is dependent on US-Soviet relations.

In the latter part of the 1970s, Jewish emigration peaked at an average of 40,000 per year. But after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, emigration nearly stopped because of the "breakdown in US-Soviet relations," Kofman suggested.

"However, in 1985 the emigration of Soviet Jews began to increase because Gorbachev, a man who wants change and to move ahead, came into power," Ryavec said.

"We see this rising in emigration a good sign, of course. But, we see this increase as a last push before it stops again," Kofman said. He predicts that based on past cycles of US-Soviet relations, Jewish immigration will soon begin to decline.

"We see a stoppage of emigration coming up in the next two years. We feel like we have to get as many people out as we can while we have the tide, the momentum," Kofman said.

"The most effective means we have of getting the Jews out of the Soviet Union is going to our congress people. They are the force we want to have behind us," Kofman said.

The Coalition and other students scheduled to lobby in the capital next week for the Soviet Jews, and encourage interested students to come. The group is presently lobbying for two families: the Lerners, from Leningrad, and the Profopopobs from Moscow. The Coalition's ultimate goal, says Kofman, is to have a "refusenik" — someone who is denied a visa to leave the Soviet Union — come to study at UMass.

More UMass students interested in teaching

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Correspondent

Leverne Thelene is pleased.

The University of Massachusetts professor of education said yesterday that the pay may not be great, but more UMass students are joining his profession.

"The interest in teaching has been increasing as the number of retirements and vacancies has increased," he said.

Elementary education majors said they also see a trend, citing an increase in the number of courses offered.

Amy Baker, a junior, said one reason for the trend may be because more opportunities are opening up in non-traditional teaching positions.

"Many communities are starting to focus on educating children before they enter kindergarten," she said. "There are also positions available to work with children in daycare centers in the workplace."

All of which leads many in the school of education to be excited about the future of their profession.

"Teaching is a difficult and challenging job, which is only attractive to those who are more people-oriented," Thelene said. The school of education, with more than 1,000 students, has five programs for students interested in education, said certification officer Michael Schwartz.

The school offers programs in early childhood education, elementary education, foundations of counseling and human development. In addition, UMass offers a secondary teacher education program, which is not part of the education major but "for students who have already earned a B.A. [and] wish to do professional preparation in the school of education," Schwartz said.

Thelene teaches 15 prospective science teachers as part of the secondary teacher program.

Massachusetts recently changed its rules regarding teacher certification, he said, with all prospective teachers now having to follow this route.

Most students, like early childhood education major Amy Zeicher, said they are pleased with the program. Zeicher said her only complaint with the school of education is that early childhood and elementary education programs are not treated separately.

The school of education has seen increased interest recently despite leveling salary prospects for teachers.

"It's hard to get help with the early childhood education program, because the elementary education people don't know early childhood information," she said.

In spite of increasing opportunities for education majors, Thelene said he does not anticipate a big jump in teachers' salaries. "I don't think salaries will increase enough to make teaching look super attractive to everyone," he said. Baker said a low salary does not dampen her enthusiasm for teaching. "The money is always going to be lousy," she said. "I'll be paid in fun instead of money."

substance abuse problem.

She said that from this experience she realized that "substance abuse was going on in a lot of my students' lives."

Weinstein said that she became interested in the problem of substance abuse because of the close relationships she had with her students.

"The more I learned the more afraid I became. Substance abuse is not in the ghetto like we think. . . . It is happening to us," she said.

Scott said teachers should understand school policy and find out if administrators support them before they confront a student suspected of having a substance abuse problem.

"Ultimately it's in the school's interest to get the kids help," she said.

Weinstein said that one must be tactful when confronting a student.

"What you must do is reassure, to tell the student 'I like you,'" she said. "Also, you must be non-judgmental. You must act as a role model, and it also helps if you can teach problem solving. If you teach problem solving, they can take that and apply it to their lives or their peers."

Scott said that a teacher's attempt to be a savior will ultimately fail. "If you say you are going to save the kid, you set yourself up. [Recognize when] you have done the most you can do."

Judge rules man accused of killing cop cannot be tried

The brothers of slain Boston police detective Sherman Griffiths are seen during a news conference yesterday in Boston. A judge decided yesterday that the accused killer could not be tried. From left to right are Kevin Coyne, Brian Griffiths, Tommy Griffiths, and Jimmy Coyne.

BOSTON (AP) — The accused killer of a Boston police officer will not be tried because members of the city's elite anti-drug squad lied to get the search warrant for a drug bust that ended in gunfire, a judge ruled yesterday.

State attorneys said they would appeal the Superior Court judge's decision and try again to have the murder charge against Albert Lewin reinstated.

Judge Charles M. Grabau told a packed courtroom that after careful consideration he had no choice but to dismiss the case against Lewin, a 33-year-old Jamaican accused of shooting Detective Sherman Griffiths during the Feb. 17, 1988 raid.

"A fair trial is not possible," Grabau said. "The Commonwealth's conduct was egregious... and the evidence is tainted."

But Assistant District Attorney Paul Leary said his office planned to continue battling for the case's reinstatement despite the conflicting and fraudulent evidence submitted by prosecutors and detailed in the judge's 30-page ruling.

"We say the lie doesn't reach the level of egregiousness the judge believes it does," Leary said. "It's in our interest to go right to the Supreme Court."

Leary said more immediately the district attorney would seek Thursday to keep Lewin in jail without bail while the prosecution pursued the case, which has raised questions about whether police routinely lie to obtain search warrants.

Boston defense attorneys have said the case proves a pattern of police abuse in obtaining search warrants and could result in new trials for dozens of convicted drug dealers who were arrested after illegal police searches.

But Leary said his office set little store by the case's broader implications.

"I'm fighting to have this case reinstated," Leary said. "I'm not too concerned about any other cases."

Meanwhile, the slain detective's family gathered to condemn the judge's ruling, charging him with making a "gutless" decision.

"We are devastated and outraged by the judge's ruling," said the victims' brother, Tommy Griffiths.

Griffiths, a 36-year-old member of the police department's elite Drug control Unit, was trying to break into an apartment in the city's Dorchester section when Lewin allegedly fired a bullet through the door and killed him.

"Grabau should have ruled on the merits of the murder case. It's a decision we feel should be made separate from the charges of perjury or other changes," the detective's brother said Wednesday.

A teary-eyed Griffiths also dismissed as irresponsible what he called "personal attacks" on Francis O'Meara, the assistant district attorney who has represent Griffith's family in the case.

Inner-city target practice

The hunt. The game. The thrill of the chase. These are words I have heard all my life — in books, film dialogues, and from people I know. How the battle was half the fun. How the hunt itself is worth more than the quarry.

Pamela McCarthy

Now the National Rifle Association tells me that I'm wrong.

It's not the thrill of the hunt, it's the ecstasy you get from turning a deer, rabbit, or bear into brown fuzzy swiss cheese from blowing them away with an Uzi semi-automatic rifle. The NRA says that semi-automatic weapons are necessary for hunting. These poor hunters need these guns to blow most of the flesh off an animal. If they get a recognizable head to put on their mantlepiece out of the deal, they're lucky.

I don't buy it. I know people that have gone hunting. Not many, mind you, but a few. They told me they liked to track the animal. They liked living off the land. They liked sleeping under the stars, and yes, they did like the hunt. But a fair hunt. A regular rifle adds to the challenge. Most of these people cringe when they hear the NRA's claim. To use an AK-47 assault (not hunting, assault) rifle has got to be the wussiest cop-out they ever heard of.

The NRA is upset because of proposed bans on assault and semi-automatic rifles. They say that criminals don't care if they are legal or not, they'd still use the guns. So why should law-abiding citizens not have access to them, also?

Well, for starters, I'd like to point out that drugs are illegal, but criminals can get their hands on them. In fact, I could get my hands on some "good" coke if I wanted to. So should we make drugs legal? Do we want to send a message out to the public that we condone the abuse of substances that can kill you? Of course not. Should we make guns legal just because some scum-sucking street vermin can get their hands on them? I don't condone the use of violent force.

Secondly, I know plenty of "law-abiding citizens" who would turn into Mega Snipers if they got an Uzi or an AK-47. We've had enough troubles from pistols that were originally bought for "protection" and ended up in the "exhibit A" bag for a murder trial. (And I'm not talking about those who shot at an actual criminal, either.)

Many people say they feel vulnerable. The police won't help them, so they have to protect themselves. Those who want to ban the lead-pumpers say the cops feel vulnerable fighting criminals with guns that will spread them across the state.

The only thing this shows me is that we should do a major overhaul on police protection. How did we ever allow these slimebags to get these weapons? I realize it's tough to stop them from getting these killing machines. However, it takes more to stop drug wars and crime than to watch news documentaries about it and wring our hands in suburban grief. It takes tough new laws like the proposed ban, it takes a willingness to enforce these laws, it takes extra police protection (read: money), and it takes a willingness to prosecute the criminals who use them. This includes the courts, the police, and yes, witnesses who are willing to testify (sorry, folks, but unless someone testifies, the prosecutors have no case, and the thugs walk).

I have to laugh when I hear the old NRA line. "Guns don't kill people, people kill people." Correct me if I'm wrong, but guns were made by people, for people who want to kill other people. I don't know of any other species on earth that can use guns, or have any interest in using them. I hate to break this to you, but people use guns to kill people. You can run away from a maniac with an axe. You can't always run from a bullet.

Behind the Iron Curtain

'The Iron Curtain'- Most of us, when we hear these words, imagine an impenetrable Great Fortress separating Western Europe from Eastern Europe. Few people are allowed in,and even fewer are allowed out. We imagine a land of oppression, limitation and censorship. How, we ask, can people possibly live under such conditions?

Scott Green

Having had the misfortune of being born into a place where freedom is greatly inhibited, the people of the Soviet Bloc must be miserable people. They must be carrying a persistent,secret wish to be somewhere else, somewhere free -or so we assume.

Last semester, while studying abroad, I had the good fortune of getting a glimpse of what lay beyond that mysterious partition which divides East from West. I visited two countries, Poland and East Germany, and despite their closeness in proximity, they were worlds apart. Never before had I thought of the Soviet Bloc countries as anything other than a single entity. I saw Hungary as no different from Bulgaria,Poland no different from East Germany. But when I went from one country to the next, I was struck by the sharp contrasts between them. Each had a personality all its own.

East Germany probably comes the closest to how one would imagine a Bloc country to be like;The place has a strange,weighty kind of atmosphere, an atmosphere laden with despondency and gloom. All of the buildings are old, redundantly grey and unappealing. Scores of vertical abodes,which were built in haste after WWII to house the millions of homeless, ugly the streets. The proletariat, who are closely watched by armed German and Russian soldiers, mill about with unsmiling faces.

This, is East Berlin, an occupied territory, the coldest, most forbidding city to which I have ever been. This, is East Germany, where vestiges of the Nazi concentration camps still litter the countryside, where Hitler committed suicide, and where the Berlin Wall still stands to keep the East German people from liberation. Try to escape from East to West Berlin and if you get past the armed guards, electric fences and land mines, then you are free.Here, everyone is a supporter of the Communist Party,but not by their own choice. This is East Germany, not Poland.

If East Germany is cold and forbidding, then Poland is warm and welcoming by comparison. Here in this Soviet Bloc country, smiling faces flourish amid some of the friendliest, most romantic people in the world. They love to open up to foreigners, especially Americans. I was inundated with admiring questions about my homeland while I was there.

Poland is a fanatically pro- American country. With America as a role model, Poles are not alien to the concepts of capitalism and democracy. In fact, a pervasive black market exists where one can bargain for anything, from vodka to a taxicab ride. Poland may be Europe's best deal, offering most anything for U.S. dollars. A ticket to the ballet cost me 35 cents!

Most people imagine Poland to be a shopper's hell of long queues and empty store counters, and they are right. In Warsaw, hundreds of tiny shops are crowdedwith anxious people who are yelling for three of these and four of those. An extreme shortage of consumer goods plagues Poland: To obtain an automobile, there is a 20 year waiting list.

After having been almost completely demolished during WWII, Warsaw now boasts a striking resemblence to yesteryear now that many of its magnificent structures have been restored and reconstructed. Of course, there is a section of the old city that has been left intact. Here, the scars of the war are apparent. Bullets and shrapnel have left their telltale prints behind.

This, is Poland, a quaint little place filled with wonderous sights and surprises, a place where people wish to be free of oppression, where people do not want to remain afraid of being people. This is not East Germany, the Soviet Union's best satellite buddy, where people are treated like animals in a cage under an old line, Stalinist leadership.

In other news. . .

Less than a year ago, enraged alderman barged into the School of the Art Institute of Chicago and snatched from a wall a portrait of the late Mayor Harold Washington in lacy lingerie. Last week the institute was defending another inflamatory exhibit, a work by Scott Tyler, self-proclaimed "supporter of the Revolutionary communist Party USA," titled What Is the Proper Way to Display a US Flag? Its key component: an American flag stretched out on the floor.

The institute claimed that Old Glory was positioned so viewers would not be forced to walk on it. But Joseph Morus, a lawyer for several veterans' groups, said the exhibit constitutes an "invitation to step on the flag." The vets, however, failed to persuade Cook County Circuit Judge Kenneth Gillis to close the show, so it reopened to the public Friday, after several days of being viewable only to students, faculty and staff.

Security guards allowed only a limited number into the gallery at any one time, but that did not stop several veterans from taking the flag off the floor and holding it up while making speeches. Said James McManus, chairman of the schools liberal-arts department: "We are trying to defend the notion that all art, provocative art, can be displayed." That is certainly true at the Art Institute.

A night to remember that the fans would rather forget

I thought it would be nice, a relaxing evening of entertainment. I never expected to be horrified.

With limited funds and a lack of desire to endure beer, bozos and belching contests, I decided against a trip southward. Instead I chose to visit my cousin Ken in Buffalo for spring break. The Buffalo Sabres and the Boston Bruins are currently battling in the standings for home-ice advantage in the upcoming playoffs. I am a loyal Bruins fan from Boston. Ken is a Sabres fan. On March 22, 1989, we went to a Sabres game against St. Louis at Buffalo's Memorial Auditorium ("The Aud".)

I enjoyed the first period, since I hadn't been to a hockey game in years. The Sabres floundered and the fans around me grumbled. With just under five minutes to play in the first period, St. Louis forward Steve Tuttle broke in on goal. Sabres defenseman Uwe Krupp tripped him and they both crashed into the net. Tuttle's right skate left the ice and slid along the right side of Sabres goalie Clint Melarchuk's neck.

Initially, my attention was diverted to the two players who knocked the net, but then I noticed the blood on the ice where Melarchuk was sprawled. At first, I thought it was a broken nose, which happens to be fairly common in hockey.

Within a second or two, it became apparent that this was no broken nose. Blood poured down the front of Melarchuk and was rapidly forming a puddle. Melarchuk pulled his mask off and rose to his knees. The puddle of blood was now about two feet in diameter.

Rick Wyatt

Players from both teams began yelling and motioning for assistance from the Sabres' bench. One Buffalo player began screaming and banging on the plexiglass door leading to the Sabres' dressingroom. Miraculously, Melarchuk was now standing with the aid of a couple of players. Two players pulled the trainer across the ice in his street shoes. He applied a towel with pressure to Melarchuk's gushing neck. A well-dressed woman behind us screamed, "For God's sake get him outta here!" The runway door opened and two paramedics escorted Melarchuk and the trainer out.

The whole event took less than 30 seconds. There was a three-foot puddle of blood on the ice, trailing off toward the runway door. The crowd around us was silent. There was little conversation. There was some crying and coughing.

I suddenly felt dizzy and nauseous. I realized that I was hyperventilating. Ken was talking to me, but I didn't know what he was saying. I did not want to faint from our seats in the first row of the balcony. I regained composure and began to realize how serious this was. It takes only three minutes to bleed to death from a severed jugular vein.

A maintenance worker came onto the ice with a shovel, an ice pick and a five-gallon bucket. Was Melarchuk alive? How would they stop the bleeding? Would a man die in a hockey game played for our amusement?

The Sabres gathered around the Buffalo bench, some leaning over it. I learned from the news that several of the players were crying. They warmed up a new goalie and cautious play resumed.

Clint Melarchuk survived a severed jugular vein and partially severed neck muscle inflicted through a six-inch long, 1.5 inch-deep gash. Had this happened in a school or minor league game where full emergency medical attention was unavailable, he probably would have bled to death.

Clint Melarchuk will play hockey again very soon, but his injury is likely to generate an interest in goalies in every league to wear neck collars. I hope Clint slept better than I during the next few nights. I kept dreaming about buckets of blood.

Maybe next year I'll go to Florida. Belching contests aren't so bad. There's usually no blood.

American flag more than just a petty symbol

The American Flag is just a symbol, or so contended a group on March 14 outside the Hatch. They were trying to inform us of a supposed great injustice in Chicago. An artist was arrested for burning the American Flag as a statement. They decided the best way to do this was by taping the American Flag to the floor of the Student Union. This was a mistake on their part. There are laws concerning the display of the American Flag in Massachusetts as well as many other states, but they feel freedom of speech covers this act. Here they are wrong as well, because freedom of speech doesn't include inciting a riot.

Paul C. Norton

But enough of the legality of the matter, there is a more important ideal on the line. Maybe a flag is just a symbol for a Grand Prix driver, but not for a country — especially for the United States of America. From the very beginning of our country's history, the earliest flag had (and still has) great meaning — remember 'Don't Tread on Me?' It was a rallying point for our country's forefathers.

It symbolized our unity and resolve to win our independence for Britain. During World War II, the American flag was displayed by families who had sons fighting in the war. Many of these same sons came home in coffins wrapped in the U.S. flag. Just a simple symbol? I think those soldiers, and families who lost sons would disagree. When the Marines placed the flag on Iwo Jima, was it just a symbol? The living and the dead would argue that point, as well as those who saw it in the newspapers.

Go to Washington D.C., visit the Wall, visit Arlington, and visit the Unknown Soldiers Tomb. Look at the names. These are all part of the United States flag. When you look at the flag they are in there. It is a symbol but not just a symbol. It's the people that have lived and died for this country and what it stands for. It stands for you and me, the people of this country.

If you can treat the flag as just a symbol, you have much to learn about symbols and their meaning. This symbol is tied to the very heart of our country. It means something, and it deserves the respect it should be given.

I was given a new perspective of some of my fellow students. The students present knew and understood what the American flag means. They grew agitated and outraged. One brave soul attempted the liberation of the American Flag. The rest that stood by America and her flag — our flag — should remember that all those who stood up for the flag in years past would be proud. This group claimed that anti-patriotism is not illegal, but neither is patriotism and national pride. And if it ever does become a crime to be proud of our flag and our country, haul me away to prison.

So much for the First Amendment. . .

The events that took place on March 14, in front of the Hatch, prove that free speech does not exist in this country or on this campus.

Jonathan Leavitt

A group of us decided that we would place a flag in front of our information table, forcing students to confront their feelings about everything that goes on under the protection of "flag" and "country." Needless to say some students were less than happy about our presentation and became vocal and physical about it. At varying times during the day we had our flag stolen, we were assaulted, our lives were threatened (and have continued to be through phone calls), and we watched as the university police spent all their time trying to shut us down instead of doing their jobs. Eventually we were faced with a choice, shut down or be arrested. So much for free speech.

A number of things struck me as ironic, saddening and ultimately dangerous. The first was the venom which we faced from members of the right-wing and some ROTC cadets. They kept telling us how many people had died for this flag. We did not disagree since this was one of the points we were trying to make. But they also continually talked about what the flag stood for, as if they had somehow had a hand in preserving the freedoms that our country has. These are the people who want to drug test you, or take away control over your own body, or force you to say a prayer before beginning school every day. Their hypocrisy was astounding. They were more concerned with protecting the flag than the principles and "freedoms" which everyone tells me it stands for.

I stared at them as they stood in front of us waving the American flag with their eyes closed, singing the Pledge of Allegiance. It sent shivers up my spine. I knew I had seen all this before somewhere. I listened as they told me to go back to Russia and I felt sympathy because I knew that these were either their parents' words or their drill instructor's words. It was peculair that anger never really became my focus — at least not towards the students.

The police, on the other hand, showed everyone exactly where they stood on the issue. First by telling us to move the flag, then by telling us that no one could step on it, and finally by telling us that we were going to be arrested if we didn't remove it. All this time we were being verbally and physically threatened. At two points we were assaulted. What were the police doing? They were standing in groups and refused to discuss their actions or lack of actions with me. At one point they were actually going through the motions of arresting me!

In some ways what happened on Tuesday was expected. In a way it is rather refreshing to see the true colors of all those who "took part" in the event. Now ask yourself again if the real patriots in this country are the ones who go around proudly proclaiming it.

Blind flag-worship disturbing

I take exception to Bradford A. Sprogis' comments about the symbolism of the American Flag ("Symbol of America," March 17). I accept that the flag represents different things for different people. Sprogis says that the flag is the symbol of the United States but not its foreign policy. I must disagree. We can only judge the sincerity of a government's values and guiding principles by its actions or lack of actions. US foreign policy is not grounded upon such noble democratic principles, nevertheless it is the only criteria upon which our neighbors can judge us.

The flag is not like the dollar bill. It is a criminal act to burn money because it is the property of the state. A flag is the property of the owner. The Constitution clearly states that people shall be "secure in their persons and property." That means all property, flags. In addition, the Constitution guarantees freedom of expression. That doesn't mean only inoffensive expressions, that means all expression — even Sprogis's letter.

Finally, why is it that some people feel so threatened by dissent? Critical thinking and dissent are central features of democracy. Blind patriotism is authoritarian and has no place in a true democracy. I am glad Sprogis is proud to live in America. I feel lucky to live in America because I've seen the alternative. But the "love it or leave it" argument is the sign of one who has a poor understanding of democratic values. I suggest he read the Constitution more carefully.

A strange addiction

Contemporary young men and women are undergoing a crisis. Many of them are at times experiencing slight forms of schizophrenia.

Being a student at the University of Massachusetts, I see this happen all the time. UMass is a school of enormous size, and it is often difficult to meet someone who is intriguing or interesting to you.

Minu Sebastian

Ever see someone at a party who you'd like to meet? So, why can't you just go up to this person, introduce yourself, and maybe ask if you could go out sometime?

Well, unless you want beer spit all over you from the person laughing so hard, you'll probably not take so direct an approach.

Instead, you decide to take a slower plan of action. First, you try to establish some sort of eye contact, but as soon as he looks back at you, you immediately look in the opposite direction. Wondering what your next step should be, you decide to ask your friends for their opinion. Big mistake.

All of your friends crowd around you and start looking around for him. After much pointing and whispering, they finally catch sight of him. He looks in your direction wondering what all the commotion is about.

You now feel totally humiliated, but you force yourself to say "hi," (you don't want to seem like a fool). You carry a casual conversation, but then leave him to be with your friends, because after all, you don't want him to think you're aggressive or desperate.

You act really cool by talking to your friends and acting like you're having a great time. Always keeping sight of where he is, you occasionally glance in his direction.

You spend the next half hour actively ignoring this person. After a while, you decide to walk past him to see if he will say anything to your when you walk by. As you're walking by, you make it a point not to look at him and act as though you're looking around for someone else. He says "hi," but you act indifferent, and continue your "search."

Eventually, he leaves and you're left with this sad and empty feeling. You wonder. . . why didn't he ask me out?

Personally, I think this guy must have some kind of mental disability if he didn't get the message that you were interested in him. Judging by your personality, your feelings should have been obvious. You were friendly, aloof, sociable, withdrawn, talkative, and quiet. Your personality had such diverse qualities that there is no way he could not be intrigued by you.

Maybe next time you should try a more direct approach. Walk up to him, "accidentally" spill beer on him, and then offer to wash his shirt. And if that doesn't work, tell him to go see a psychotherapist because he definitely has a communication problem.

Monotone yuks for sure at Smith

By COSMO MACERO JR.

I saw Steven Wright at Catch a Rising Star in Harvard Square a couple of years ago. What a f— riot. It was one of those Monday night open-mike deals. I went to see my friend he sucked.

In any case, Wright made a guest appearance, along with a bunch (no, make that a "host") of other nationally recognized comedians. It was a damned good show, and for just three bucks too!

Over a relatively short five or so years, Steven Wright has reached the pinnacle of stand-up success. His original monotone delivery and outrageous view of the world around us has made him a staple on both the Tonight Show, and Late Night with David Letterman, the two most prestigious forums for aspiring comedians.

COMEDY

Wright's material has ranged from the simple and witty: "Every once in awhile I look up and smile for the satellite photo," to the uniquely bizarre: "I put my car key in the lock on my front door, started up my house, and got on the highway. I pulled over, parked, and went out and told everyone to get out of my driveway."

In a benefit concert sponsored by Friends of Children, Inc., Steven Wright will perform this Saturday night at Smith College's John Greene Hall in Northampton. Tickets are $15 at the door, $13 in advance and $11 for students with valid ID. Show starts at 8 p.m.

Through their paintings, photos, local artists tell tales of culture

By REBECCA MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The Center for the Arts in Northampton is now hosting exhibits by two different artists: Boundaries/Margins, oil paintings and pastel drawings by Chuck Stern, and Cambodians: Amherst and the Bronx, black and white photographs by Leah Melnick.

Chuck Stern's Boundaries/Margins is in the East Gallery and consists of many brightly colored works all dealing with human figures, both alone and interacting, many of which took over a year to complete.

"In some cases there's a lot more to them than meets the eye," Stern said, explaining that under the surface of his paintings are layers of images, forms, and colors that didn't work but were necessary in the evolution of the paintings. With the oils, Stern said, images emerge from smudges. He claims that he had nothing in mind before beginning any of his major pieces.

Titles Stern chooses mainly for identification purposes. "There are stories here," he said. "I really don't like to tell a story with a title," he added, saying that he prefers people who come to see his work to make up their own stories of what's in the paintings. He hopes people will get something out of it. "When you put something up publically, you are saying, 'you may judge this,'" he said.

Leah Melnick's exhibit, in the West Gallery is quite different. Already involved in photography, Melnick became interested in the experiences of Cambodians in America while tutoring a Cambodian student from Amherst High School several years back who was a foster child living with an American family. Hearing one person's story sparked her interest in how others were rebuilding their lives. Melnick left school at Hampshire College for one semester to take a job in New York and made an effort to meet Cambodians there through volunteer work.

The exhibit, Cambodians: Amherst and the Bronx, is a result of the last three years' work and has been shown previously in Amherst, New York, and California.

Melnick, a freelance photo-journalist, said, "I'm interested in photographing things that I care about on a social level," although she said she photographs a variety of things for publication.

One photograph in the exhibit entitled "Kids Playing in Amherst" is often misinterpreted said Melnick. The photograph shows two young boys playing with guns, "which is not specific to Cambodians," Melnick said. Rather, it is meant as, "a remark on our culture which encourages playing with guns," she said. "I think people take it for granted that it's a diverse area we're living in. This isn't just art work. This is supposed to be telling you something about the community we're living in." Melnick said she likes to, "give a sense of what has happened to their (Cambodians') culture and their families."

Cambodians: Amherst and the Bronx and Boundaries/Margins will be at the Center for the Arts in Northampton through April 9. Gallery hours are Tues.-Fri. 12-5pm, weekends 2-5pm. Admission is free. For more information call 584-7327 or 586-7282 during office hours.

Music Theater Guild gives the view from West Side

By MICHAEL T. PUOPOLO, II
Collegian Correspondent

"And they were a pair of star-crossed lovers . . ." These immortal words from William Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet come alive to the music of Leonard Bernstein in the UMass Music Theater Guild's production of West Side Story. With a modern theme, and a rousing musical score, the pride and prejudice of love in the ghetto are brought to suburban Amherst with a pride of its own.

THEATER

The time is the late 1950's, where racial tensions were high between rival gangs in new York's Lower West Side of Manhattan. The struggle between the resident white gang, the "Jets," and the Puerto Rican immigrants, the "Sharks," prevent the ill fated love between a white man and a Puerto Rican woman. Tony and Maria are the unfortunate victims of circumstance in an inescapable gang war.

The performance opens with a dancing demonstration of the animosity that each gang harbors for each other. Having tolerated each other's presence long enough, the Sharks and the Jets decide to prove, once and for all, who's the tougher of the two. Both gangs decide on a fair fist-fight, but the rumble gets out of control. By the time the police arrive on the scene of the skirmish, it is clear that Tony and Maria never be together.

I am pleased with the entire ensemble. It is evident that a tremendous amount of work went into the direction and choreography of the show. Outstanding performances are given by Michael Harding as Tony, Melissa Munn as Maria, Thomas Berry as Action, Noreen MacDonald as Anita and Randy Elkinson as Riff. Fine performances are also given by Lee Russell, Dean Lapham, Lynn Steinberg, Bill Larkin and the dance chorus.

Technically speaking, the lighting design is clearly of Broadway caliber. The set designed by Bill Stewich is very impressive, with effective use being made of both horizontal and vertical stage space. It is very real, and conveys a strong feeling of presence to the audience. The production is backed by a thirty-piece orchestra of Five College students, and staffed by both Fine Arts Center personnel and Music Theater Guild members.

This production of West Side Story will run in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight thru Saturday. All shows begin at 8 p.m. Tickets are on sale now at the FAC Box Office, and will be available at the door, $3 for Five College students with ID and $6 for the general public.

Polish dancers perform April 6 at FAC

The world famous Polish dance troupe, Mazowsze (pronounced Mazoffshuh) will perform at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center on Thursday, April 6, at 8 p.m. in the FAC Concert Hall as part of its seventh North American tour.

The colorful and energetic troupe performs the native dances nand songs of Poland's varied regions, garbed in authentic folk dress. Mazowwsze's 100 dancers ands singers make over 1,000 costume changes as they perform dance [illegible] non without pause.

Mazowsze was founded in 1948 by Tadeusz Sygietynski, a composer and researcher of Polish Folklore, and his wife, Mira Zaminska, once Poland's leading actress, who turned to costume and stage design. They established a colony at Karolin, an old estate 20 miles outside of Warsaw in the central plains of Poland and called it Mazowsze after that region.

Since 1950 Mazowsze has literally covered the world in its performance tours, still led by Zaminska. Critics and audiences alike have delighted at the authenticity, precision and style which is so evident in Mazowsze's performances.

Tickets are available at the FAC Box Office. For more information call 545-2511.

TARKANIAN RESPONDS — University of Nevada-Las Vegas basketball coach Jerry Tarkanian yesterday responds to allegations that two of his players accepted money from a convicted gambler. Former player Eldridge Hudson, seated, and current player Moses Scurry, standing, as well as assistant coach Mark Warkenstein, in sweater, attended the press conference.

Moslem leader, aide killed

BRUSSELS (AP) — The Imam of the Brussels Mosque and his aids were shot and killed yesterday, police said. The attack followed threats on the Moslems leader prompted by his comments about Salman Rushdie and his book "The Satanic Verses."

Killed were Imam Abdullah Ahdal, a 36-year-old Saudi, and his aide, Salem Behir, 40, of Tunisia. Behir oversees the mosque's social service and library.

No arrests were made, and there was no claim of responsiblity for the killings.

A police spokesman said both men were shot in the head at about 6:30 p.m. in Ahdal's office inside the mosque, which is in a park near the European Community's headquarters.

The officer, who spoke on condition of enonymity, said the imam received threats after he made a statement on Belgian television about Rushdie, whose novel is considered blasphemous by many Moslems.

A television reporter said the station received angry telephone calls after Ahdal's Feb. 20 appearance. Callers said his remarks had been improperly translated from Arabic.

Although Ahdal's remarks were considered moderate, the reporter said he had condemned the British author's book.

Eastern offers gift checks, expands on-time guarantees

MIAMI (AP) — Eastern Airlines, seeking to lure passengers scared off by a four-week strike, has expanded an on-time guarantee for Northeast travelers and offered a $25 gift check for all passengers on the Eastern Shuttle and on 14 non-stop flights between Washington and Boston.

The airline announced yesterday that, beginning April 3, all travelers flying Eastern between Boston and Washington D.C. will have the price of their tickets refunded if their flight departs more than five minutes late. The passengers will receive a $25 American Express check just for flying Eastern on those routes.

Both the on-time and American Express offers on the shuttle and non-stop flights for weekend travelers.

Eastern was extending a shuttle on-time guarantee that started March 20 and would have expired March 31, and expanding that guarantee to the non-stop Boston-Washington flights.

Cash or a charge-card credit will be offered to any passengers who qualifies for the refund. Or the customer can choose to receive a free one-way ticket on the same route for future travel.

Natural Resources Defense Council in New York. "While Exxon is clearly trying to do everything they can right now, the response has really been inexcusably slow."

Speer said the company had "squandered" several days of good weather and clam seas "because the response that was supposed to be in place was not."

Exxon's Rogers denied such charges.

"We think we have acted responsibly and promptly," he said in a telephone interview from Houston. "We were moving a good deal of material up to the Alaska area from the very start, and we were employing that equipment and material as soon as it got there."

A New York oil industry analyst confirmed deep staff cuts at most oil companies, but said he had no indication that oil spill control suffered more than any other area of the industry.

Stephen Smith, an analyst with Bear Sterns, compared keeping a large staff of oil spill experts to buying insurance. "If it's not a here and now present danger, those people are not essential," he said.

A spokesman for Atlantic Richfield Co. said the company had trimmed its workforce by more than 19 percent started in 1985, but insisted its oil spill programs had not been affected.

"Obviously in the process there we lost a number of skilled people," ARCO spokesman Albert Greenstein said in a telephone interview from Los Angeles yesterday. "But to imply that the oil spill effort suffered as a result of that is really off base."

"It's not a matter of having a handful of 'experts' who know how to fight spills," Greenstein said.

Golob said that Exxon has been an active participant in international efforts to improve the response to oil spills.

The company belongs to a number of consortiums of oil companies that maintain spill control equipment and response teams in the Caribbean, the Gulf of Mexico, Singapore and the United Kingdom, he said.

Golob said oil spill clean up is no longer a growth industry because the frequency of major spills has declined in the last few years and career opportunities in the field have decreased. The Coast Guard has also cut its budget for oil spill response, he said.

Globe responds to criticism about donation

BOSTON (AP) — William O. Taylor, publisher of The Boston Globe, was apparently unaware of a group's lobbying efforts for the Seabrook, N.H., nuclear power plant when he approved a $10,000 donation to it last year, the newspaper said.

Critics of the nuclear power plant have questioned the donation, saying it might have reflected on the paper's coverage of the public policy battle over still-idle plant.

Taylor released a statement Tuesday saying the contribution to the Coalition for Reliable Energy was "to help...support initiatives to develop effective uses of energy," and "was not made to assist in any lobbying efforts for any purpose."

"The decision was made as a business decision. The Globe is a business highly dependent on large amounts of energy and subsequently its effective use. It was made without regard to any news coverage or editorial position of the paper."

Richard Gulla, spokesman for the Globe, said: "We were not aware of the lobbying aspects of the organization at the time the grant was made. We didn't do our homework as well as we should have."

Attorney General James Shannon sued the Coalition for Reliable Energy in 1987, accusing it of unfair and deceptive advertising for failing to disclose where it gets its money.

The group denies breaking the law, and the suit is pending in Suffolk Superior Court.

Critics have said the coalition has not fully disclosed that most of its support comes from 12 New England utilities that built Seabrook.

The group raised $1.5 million last year, and $1.2 million of that came from utility companies, the Globe said Wednesday.

"I'm really very upset. It is such a blatant conflict of interest," Mary Ott, cochairwoman of citizens Urging Responsible Engery, said of the donation.

Her group supports permanently closing the Pilgrim nuclear power plant in Plymouth.

"If this was going to happen, you should have given $10,000 to the other side," she said.

"Very few large papers with good reputations become seriously involved as supporters in public issues that are predictably going to get intense coverage by their news staffs," said Benjamin Bagdikian, journalism professor at the University of California at Berkeley.

"This sounds like a bit of bad judgement. But it's not enough money to make them think they were trying to change the course of history," said Suzanne Levine, editor of the Columbia Journalism Review.

David McDeritt, executive director of the Coalition for Reliable Energy, said it stopped its advertising campaign in 1987 before the Globe made its donation.

It did take out a half-page advertisement in May 1988 about energy seminars it was sponsoring.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Self-improvement projects and educational studies enjoy favorable influences. Your chances of making "easy money" are slim. Do not despair! A consistently good performance at work will pay rich dividends.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Romance will be secondary to your career now. New responsibilities at work will mean a fatter paycheck. Learn to delegate more authority. Younger people are eager to show what they can do.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Positive forces are on your side if you have a new idea you want to promote. Make sure your facts and figures are correct. Legal action is best postponed. Seek a compromise.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) A second income could be linked to a tip from a close associate. Use the "soft sell" if trying to win an argument. A friend shares an important secret, you benefit directly.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) The renewal of an old friendship could prove quite fruitful. Distant affairs are a source of deep satisfaction. Do everything you can to satisfy higher-ups' demands. Romance is full of surprises.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Someone or something very alluring is seducing you off the beaten path. The time may not be right for making a major move. Your spontaneity brings others great pleasure now. Be yourself.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) New partnerships should flourish. Pool your ideas and resources with mate or business partner. Donate unwanted items to your favorite charity. Use public transportation whenever you can today.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Concentration will be easier if you isolate yourself. You feel more optimistic about the future. Guard against unnecessary spending. Having a nest egg will help relieve tension when an emergency arises.

Hulk konked Savage's opponent and his own arch-rival, "The Million Dollar Man" Ted DiBiase, over the head with a chair, knocking DiBiase into the middle of next week and giving Savage the historic win and the coveted WWF title belt.

But after only a few months, the relationship became strained. The only thing bigger than the Hulkster's biceps is his ego and he obviously had trouble dealing with having somebody else in the spotlight. Whenever the two appeared together, Hogan did all he could to steal center stage from the new champion.

Before long, Hulk really overstepped the bounds of decency and hired the lovely Elizabeth, Savage's main squeeze, as his manager.

The Macho Man kept his cool for a while but things came to a head two months ago in a nationally-televised prime-time match in Milwaukee. Savage and Hogan, the MegaPowers, were facing the Big Boss Man and Akeem, a pair of 350-pound-plus behemoths who call themselves The Twin Towers.

Early in the fateful match, Savage was tossed over the top rope and came crushing down on the defenseless Elizabeth, who knocked her pretty little noggin on the solid concrete floor. Both were dazed, but Randy came to his feet and stumbled into the ring.

Hogan, meanwhile rushed to the aid of The Lovely One, carrying her to the First Aid station backstage. Savage saw Liz in the Hulk's arms and became understandably confused and enraged.

Hogan's initial act may have been noble, but even after Elizabeth was receiving proper medical attention, the blubbering bleach blond stayed with her for at least 20 minutes, sobbing and caressing Liz's hand. Meanwhile, the match went on and the Macho Man was left alone to deal with two guys who could go through any mortal man faster than a group of Spring Breakers go through a case of Busch.

At the pleading of Elizabeth, Hogan finally went back to the ring, where Savage somehow was handling the Towers. After the Macho Man had tossed both opponents out of the ring, Hulk wanted to tag in and gain some glory. Savage obliged with a slap across the face, setting the wrestling world on its ear.

Adding fuel to Sunday's fire, Elizabeth has decided to appear at the big match in a neutral corner, implying she will leave with the winner and confirming one observer's view that she is, indeed, a belt slut.

Macho Man has since berated Hogan for his "grandstanding and hotdogging" and claims Hulk has been envious of Savage's title and his woman for a long time. Savage said he got great satisfaction out of clobbering the Hulkster in a melee that ensued after match in Milwaukee and has not had the fire in his eyes that he does now since he won the championship.

Meanwhile, Hogan talks about Savage betraying him while he carries the dreams of all his little Hulkamaniacs on his back. Please, give it a rest, Hulkster. How many times in the past have we seen former friends turn on Hogan (Andre the Giant, Paul Orndorff, to name a couple)? And the "all-my-little-Hulksters" bit wore thin years ago.

Unfortunately, none of this will matter come Sunday. Money talks, especially in the world of WWF czar Vince McMahon, and somehow the Hulk seems to have kept his enormous popularity and marketability after all these years. It was a bold move to take the title away from him last year, but McMahon was surely looking ahead even then at this matchup, a return to the top for Hogan and a windfall of profit. Sorry wrestling fans, but it looks like we're in for another year or two with the bumbling egomaniac Hulk Hogan as our champion.

Believe it or not, there will be 13 other matches on the card, any of which could be a main event on its own on any other night. But there isn't enough time in the day to talk about all of them.

One very interesting twist worth mentioning, however, is the return of the ever-popular Rowdy Roddy Piper after a two-year hiatus.

near the right circle for a goal to make it 10-7 after three quarters, and then a goal from Soudan and two more from Codignotto tied it at 10-all, still with 10:59 left, and the Boyden Hill crowd of 3486 was abuzz.

"One of the good characteristics is that this team doesn't fold," Garber said. "That was a good comeback."

But there was Cornell to kill the rally. Steve Meyer banged home one of his three goals to make it 11-10 before Soudan's fourth goal of the game, a side-winding one-hopper from about 45 feet, slipped past Schimoler under the crossbar with 7:42 to play.

The Gorillas kept up the intensity, but Schimoler was able to hold them out until Snow finally gave Cornell the lead for good.

"We had a couple of good shots and I thought we had the go-ahead goal, but we just didn't connect," Garber said.

It was a disappointing loss for UMass, but just the beginning of a long, tough road for the team, and Garber was able to keep everything in perspective.

"This was the first major game of our schedule, and we would have rather won, but it's not like this was the last game of the season," he said.

UMass looks to rebound Saturday at St. John's.

Gorilla Grumblings: Yesterday's game featured two of the three active 200-game winners in the country. Garber leads with 280, while Cornell's Richie Moran now has 212 . . . senior co-captain Chris Zusi missed his fourth straight game with a knee injury suffered before the California trip.

game but Yale coach Francesca Den Hartog was already putting the game in the bank and inserted her backup goaltender, senior Lia Kiladis.

'Our inexperience showed up and they just kept taking it to us," Bossio said.

The Gazelle attack also kept taking it to Sharkey the whole game. UMass actually outshot Yale 27-25 but Sharkey made some big saves. Murphy ran throughout the circle like a running back bouncing off tacklers on many plays during the game and got right in on Sharkey but her teammates were not there to help her most of the time.

"Sue Murphy played great," Bossio said. "But Sue Murphy can't do it all alone and everyone is stopping to watch Sue Murphy play."

Gorillas come up short vs. Cornell, 12-11

Turnovers hurt UMass

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

There was a proverbial hump in the middle of Boyden Field yesterday, and the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team just couldn't get over it.

The Gorillas came from behind five times, but never forged into the lead. And when John Snow bounced a shot between the legs of UM goalkeeper Sal LoCascio with 5:27 to play, the Gorillas had run out of comebacks, and fourth-ranked Cornell University (5-0) had itself a thrilling 12-11 victory.

"This was just a great lacrosse game. Unfortunately the wrong team won from our perspective," UMass coach Dick Garber said.

The game brought back memories of last year's five-overtime classic in Ithaca, NY, an 8-7 UM win. This time, UMass had several chances to tie the game again and force the OT, and was holding the possession in the Cornell end into the last minute. Garber called for a timeout with 1:42 to play and his team with the ball.

"We set up a play and had a good shot, and then we had a continuity set up, but we never got into it," Garber said. "We got near the crease and turned it over. We didn't complete the second half of the play."

Turnovers were a major problem for the seventh-ranked Gorillas (3-1) in the early going. Coming off last week's successful trip West, they looked a little tense at the start, and Cornell came out firing, opening the scoring just 19 seconds into the contest on a goal by Tim McDevitt.

Comeback No. 1 came with Pat Leahy off the field for holding, as Jim McAleavey found Scott Hiller in front with a centering pass, and Hiller one-timed it past goalkeeper Paul Schmoler at 2:08.

The Big Red, after surviving a two-man down situation, banged home two more to go up, 3-1, but Tim Soudan tied it with a pair, including a sensational over-the-back job. That tie didn't last, with Cornell getting goals by Chris Marzullo and Vince Angotti before Paul Ganci's goal closed out the period with UMass on the negative side, 5-4.

After the wild first period, defense took over in the second, each team getting just one goal to give Cornell a 6-5 halftime advantage. UMass was bothered by turnovers, with several scoring opportunities coughed up and turned into Cornell fast breaks.

"We came down about five times in a row and had turnovers without getting a shot off," Garber said. "That hurt us and kept Cornell in the game."

And then in the third quarter, the Big Red looked like it was ready to run away with it, scoring four times around a McAleavey tally to take a 10-6 lead with 5:46 left in the period. Garber called time to rally his troops.

"We wanted to change our offensive set. We thought it might give us a new look," Garber said.

That new look worked as the Gorillas came flying back. Soudan found Rob Codignotto

Women's lacrosse dumped by Yale, 17-7

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

There is only one way for a player in any sport to get some experience. He or she has to play. The more she plays, the more she learns.

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is very young and each game is going to bring a new lesson for them. Sometimes, like yesterday, when the Gazelles were stopped dead in their tracks by Yale, 17-7, UMass (now 1-3) is going to have to learn the hard way.

Dolores Angulo had two goals in yesterday's loss.

UMass coach Patti Bossio did not even know what the score was at the end of the game. She was more concerned with how her team had played and she did not have to look at the scoreboard to see that.

The inexperience of the UMass defensive unit, which contains five freshmen, showed all afternoon. Sophomore goaltender Liz Keats was faced with Bulldog forwards in all alone on her on countless occasions.

The first few, she stopped, but after a while it was just too much for one goaltender to handle. A more veteran-oriented Yale team was one or two steps ahead of UMass throughout the game.

"One of the things that we tried to impress on our defense before we started was to not let those kids catch, step up and try to intercept all the time and they let'em catch and we just weren't strong enough defensively one-on-one against that team," Bossio said.

As a result, sophomore Amy Whitaker, junior Lisa Dubbs had big days for Yale, which is now 4-2 on the season. Whitaker had six goals, four of them in the second half, when the Bulldogs broke the game wide open.

"They weren't any faster than us," senior co-captain Lynn Hartman said. "We just got caught and we weren't up on them, denying the ball."

Dubbs had three goals, all in the first half. But the Gazelles were able to hang around in the first half, trailing only 7-3 at halftime. If the attack could have converted on a few of those early, UMass could have even went into halftime with a lead.

The Gazelles fell behind 3-0 in the first 11 minutes of the game. UMass had been within inches of scoring on two separate occasions during the first 10 minutes when junior Sue Murphy hit the cross bar of the goal tended by Catherine Sharkey.

The Gazelles also got a bad break when they had apparently tied the game at one when Cathy Fuhrman dished to Murphy on a two-on-one break. Murphy scored but the goal was nullified because her stick was in the goalie crease.

Down 3-0, UMass came back with two goals, one by freshman Dolores Angulo at 13:00 of the first half and the next by junior Ann King at 17:33.

Yale responded with a spurt in which the Bulldogs scored three goals in five minutes, one by Whitaker and the next two by Dubbs. The Gazelles got one back when Murphy netted her tenth goal of the season at 23:51.

The Bulldogs took control of the game in the early minutes of the second half, scoring the first five goals to take a 12-3 advantage. Whitaker had three of those goals.

By that time, Keats was getting frustrated and UMass was on the ropes with its opponent going for the knockout.

"Liz had an off day," Bossio said. "She started putting it all on herself. It's going to go in on her. It's her first year. She just has to take those lumps and come back that much stronger."

There were still 15 minutes left in the Sports fans, we are now entering a big time of the year. Final Four college basketball. Baseball's opening day. Pro hockey and hoops playoffs. UMass lax. But one event this weekend makes all this pale in comparison.

Of course, I speak of, (drumroll please), WRESTLEMANIA V.

Emanating from the luxurious Trump Plaza in Atlantic City, this Sunday's card will be "the wrestling extravaganza of a lifetime," promises the World Wrestling Federation's Mean Gene Okerlund.

This year's main event should be one of the biggest battles in recent memory, a grudge match to end all grudge matches. Bigger than Tyson vs. Givens. Bigger than Wade vs. Margo. Bigger even than the Republican Club vs. the Spartacists. We're talking Randy "Macho Man" Savage, the heavyweight champeen of the world, against former tag-team partner, confidant and longtime champ, the legendary Hulk Hogan.

The two biggest forces in pro wrasslin' today first became allied in last year's Trump To Do when the Hulkster came to the aid of the Macho Man in the final match of the championship elimination

Anthrax virus wages war on University

By GEORGE PANSY
Collegian Staff

An accidental spill of the deadly anthrax virus into the University of Massachusetts water supply Tuesday has killed nearly all of the campus, officials said yesterday.

Approximately 15,000 students, administrators and staff were wiped out by the disease, which kills its victim within 24 hours.

According to police reports, director of Hazardous Research Bill Dufas is reportedly responsible for the spill. Asked to comment on the accident, Dufas said, "Ooops!"

Director of Public Safety Arthur Hillside said the department was adopting the slogan, "Don't drink the water" during the crisis.

"We have everything under control," Hillside said. "We have several leads on the problem, and should have the case cracked within a few days," he said.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey, calling in from Hawaii, said classes would be cancelled indefinitely.

"I wish I could be there for this crisis; I'd like to buy everyone left some Chinese food. I hope to be back very soon," he said.

Duffey said that as soon as the crisis was over, he would remove all alcohol bans, reinstate the Legal Services Office and use his $103,000 salary to have a big party at his place.

Duffey said he was placing the campus under the control of Hillside "for a little while."

Hillside said he was placing the campus under martial law and would be installing a police substation in the Collegian offices. The Collegian will not be published tomorrow.

Hillside said the disease had infiltrated the entire plumbing system of the University, tainting water and all food boiled in water at the DC's, which is all food.

Dufas has said in past statements on his research that the disease poses no threat to humans.

"I guess I was wrong on that one," Dufas said. He added that he would be going on sabbatical for a little while

Trump buys UMass

By KATHERINE T. GREAT
Collegian Starved

International resort-owner and money collector Donald Trump has just bought the University of Massachusetts at Amherst for $86 and a Wade Boggs baseball card, a source with the University said yesterday.

Trump's purchase of the University, now known as UTrump, apparently brought great relief to Governor Michael Dukakis, an insider said, because he was seen tap dancing on his desk.

"I'm glad to be rid of that eyesore," Dukakis said. "Those kids were really getting on my nerves."

Board of Regents chairman Paul Tsongas said, "When I said we should run the higher education system like a business, I meant it. It wasn't making us a profit, so we sold it off."

Trump named his wife Ivana chancellor of UTrump, saying that her previous management experience at his New Jersey casinos were a boon to the University.

We could turn a definite profit here," he said.

Outgoing chancellor Joseph Duffey said, "Good luck — you'll need it." Mrs. Trump would not comment except to say about the campus, "What a dump."

The first item on Trump's agenda, after changing the University's name, was to announce construction of a new Trump Tower as an addition to the Student Union.

"We're not getting rid of the Student Union . . . only making a new building for wholesome, all-American RSOs like the Republican Club," he said.

When asked for a reaction to the proposed tower and name change, a nearly speechless W.Greg Rothman could only say, "I love waterfalls."

Just then, Jason Rabinowitz and other members of the Young Communist League asked, "But what about us? What about the left wing RSOs?"

Trump snapped, "Get a job, pinko," prompting Rothman to burst into tears, saying, "Finally, there's someone who understands me!"

Collegian editor abducted, executed by Muslims

By FAH RMDRAGOONN
Collegian Staff

Armed and veiled perpetrators stormed the Collegian offices yesterday afternoon and abducted editor-in-chief Rick Santos. Later the terrorists, billing themselves "Khomeini is Righteous and Good"(KRG), released a film to the Associated Press of Santos' summary execution. No demands were released prior to the slaying and the KRG leader, as yet unidentified, termed the execution as "necessary for the well-being of the state of Allah."

Collegian editor Rick Santos' head is wrapped in tape by Muslim terrorists.

The KRG moved swiftly and deftly through the Collegian security post and proceeded toward the editor's office. Santos was bound with heavy tape and dragged out of the newsroom via a seldom used back entrance where the terrorists had a 1979 Ford Econline seven passenger panel van with Iranian plates waiting for their departure. A Collegian photographer managed to take five photos of the abduction before he was beaten into unconsciousness by a KRG gunman. He remains in stable, though comatose, condition at Cooley Dickinson hospital.

The KRG film, in Cinemascope, Sensaround, 70mm Dolby begins by showing Santos being bound by the neck with thick electrical chords. State Department officials were able to reach the Iranian consulate early this morning. They denied connection with the terrorists but released a statement from Khomeini's advisers in Tehran. The statement supports the actions of the KRG and announces a cash settlement slated for later in the week, along with a ticker-tape parade, and plans for a six-part mini-series on Iranian cable. On the motives for the execution, the statement says, "The KRG is right, D.C. food ain't half bad. I had a beef streudel over at Beirut University a few weeks ago and I was more than satisfied. The crust was perfect, flaky but still a hint of moistness. You have to remember, they're cooking for a lot of kids. They can't make everyone happy."

Because so little is known about the KRG, Secret Service officials have denied comment. Answers are promised by nightfall. No clues as to the location of the execution have been uncovered. Mrs. Roache Santos, the slain editor's estranged wife, was not available for comment. Santos' position as editor has yet to be filled.

One student at the University was taking the disease very seriously, and had organized a protest on the Student Union steps.

Will Fite, a junior Social Thought and Political Economy major, said his newly-formed group, Student for a Disease-Free University, would protest the disease until it killed him.

Fite, the only protestor on hand for the event, said the Department of Defense and the defense industry had conspired to kill off the campus for its liberal tendencies.

"They wanna kill me just 'cuz I'm a commie," said Fite. "Well, I say, better red than dead by a disease that attacks your heart and head." He then began chanting the impromptu slogan, interrupting only to say, "Hey, I like that."

Other students at the University, meanwhile, are using the crisis as a time to catch up on some much-needed partying and sleeping time.

"I sure hope the packies stay open," said junior Leisure Studies major Cliff Funt.

PVTA board meeting disrupted

By SAM SPORTSNERD
Collegian Staff Infection

Amherst police were called to the Pioneer Valley Transportation Authority garage last night as a brawl erupted between the bus service's Board of Directors and members of the UMass Republican Club.

"They're communists," charged club president W. Greg Wrathman following the fisticuffs. "This free bus stuff is for the pablum pukers. . . period!"

He and fellow club members Ken Greg Ruble, O. Greg Darling, and Scott Greg Kramer had attended the Board's weekly meeting to voice their concerns, but were asked to leave after complaining about the quality of the donuts served, according to police.

When they refused, PVTA executive director Martin O'Snide pulled Darling to his feet by his right ear, sparking the violence, according to Wrathman.

"The chief pinko grabbed Brian, so I headbutted him," said Wrathman. "It was in self-defense; I'm totally innocent. He's not really hurt. As anyone who knows me will tell you, my head is not solid, it's soft and friendly to the touch."

O'Snide — who was treated for a slight concussion and acute disgust at University Health Services — has not decided if he will press charges. "W. is a dink," he said, "but he's already suing me, the PVTA, the Geneva Convention, Bob Dylan, the State of Massachusetts, Karl Marx. . . The courts are all booked up."

No arrests were made at the scene, though the garage sustained $250 worth of damage, according to police. "There were shredded corduroy hats and "Driver of the Year" nomination papers everywhere — real gross stuff," described Amherst Chief of Police Don Myohmy. "And the honey glazed were kinda stale too, I must say."

It was unclear at press time whether the Collegian had bothered to check its facts, or cared enough to ever follow up on this story.

Boston's Mayor Flynn talks revolution

By THOMAS ODDRIGUES
Collegian Staff

"Pigs are the wave of America's future," said Boston Mayor Raymond Flynn yesterday to an astonished Campus Center Auditorium crowd of seven second graders.

Flynn, 47, said he wasn't sure why, but he thinks pigs will figure prominently in almost every aspect of 21st Century America.

Pigs are small, pinkish mud-loving, farmland creatures and are the source of sausages, ham and bacon. They are akin to another small farm animal bearing the same name of the product derived from it, the baloney, he said.

"I look out into the world and I can see many things. I see poverty. I see hunger. I see corruption. I see London. I see France. I see Inez's underpants," said Flynn pointing to second guest speaker Inez McCormack and laughing to the delight of his audience.

Flynn, who prides himself on being the champion of the underdogs — himself being one of them — said the world would soon have to bow down to the humble creatures known as pigs and would eventually "have to change that name to something more regal than pig due to the pig's high standing in other sectors of the universe."

Although Flynn's ambitions concerning the curly-tailed animal, often a breakfast sideorder, seem unattainable, unreal and downright unbecoming of a man of his supposed intelligence, Flynn said he is positive the changes will take place because he had seen the entire "pork revolution" in an OMNI vision, technicolor, sensurround, surroundsound dream last night, he said.

"It was very real," Flynn said.

Flynn explained he had never believed in past, present or future psychic emanations or readings, had never experienced deja-vu, the feeling that something has happened before the feeling that something has happened before or had any reported bouts of mental illness. He did say, however, he had recently purchased Time-Life book's series Mysteries of the Unknown. His first book, Mystic Places, affected him profoundly he said. (He kept the book even though he could return it at any time)

Flynn surprised the crowd while at the microphone when he rolled his eyes, gurgled, appeared to become transparent and dissappeared altogther.

Inez McCormack said she was upset that Flynn had "hogged the stage and stolen her ideas" from her. She said she would probably sue him as soon as his physical presence could be detected.

North Pleasant St. lungy causes five car pile-up

By CLAUD BALLS
Collegian Stag

Police said yesterday that adverse road conditions were to blame for an accident on North Pleasant Street early Thursday which involved five cars and caused damages in excess of $4,500.

The accident occurred shortly after 9 a.m. at the crosswalk intersection near University Drive when, witnesses said, a car approaching the area at high speed attempted to slow down but caught its tires in what appeared to be a slippery green substance covering the road and rear-ended a second car skidding over a campus pond duck in the process.

As the driver of the first vehicle emerged from his car three other cars hit the same green slick and collided with the first two vehicles, police said.

Officers on the scene of the accident said they determined the green substance to be snot most likely put there by a student on the way to a 9:05 class.

Police are currently investigating the evidence in their inhouse laboratory in Dickinson Hall and hope to apprehend the student within 48 hours.

Officer J.J. "slap the cuffs on 'em" Hebner, who is heading up the new Impossible Accident Investigation Unit at the University, speculated briefly on what they would be looking for.

"Because the slick was 4 feet wide, we may be looking for a group of left-or right-wing radical terrorist students, or one student with a very large nose," Hebner said.

Arturo Aguila Hilsone, Director of Public Safety, said, "Rest assured, we will clear up this snot thing with good solid police work."

Officer Vicki Boyle said it was too bad no one was injured and that he was upset he couldn't issue any speeding tickets. Boyle had attempted to give speeding tickets to pedestrians passing by the accident until a senior officer told him the tickets would never hold up in court and not to strain himself by walking around so much. The enraged Boyle kicked at the ground and then stormed off mumbling something about never letting him have any fun and sobbing because he had a girl's name.

No injuries were reported, save the duck which was killed instantly. Police had little remorse for said duck.

"The duck was clearly out of line by being here. He deserved what he got. In fact, I wish more of 'em got it. They don't like us much," said Officer John Smallberries, badge 5352, of Littleton, S.S. number 014-36-5208, who requested anonymity.

Smallberries was probably referring to an incident last month in which he and another officer were allegedly attacked by what he called "a shitload of angry ducks" while they were investigating stolen wood being used in Cutback City.

"Aside from Officer Smallberries' getting attacked by ducks, this is the funniest thing I've ever seen," said Smallberries' partner.

In other police reports:

● Police were called to Washington Residence Hall Thursday to investigate multiple reports of a strange and suspicious object lying in the middle of a seventeenth floor hallway.

Upon further investigation, the object was found to be a textbook.

The Department of Public Safety's newly-created Strange and Suspicious Objects Disposal Unit responded and loaded the offensive article into a shiny silver thermal blastproof container.

The whole nerve-tingling episode ended after three hours when police were able to maneuver the offensive article into a blastproof container with the aid of hardened nylon tension bars.

One student remarked, "It was the scariest thing I've ever experienced. I had no idea what the thing was. It just sat there and sat there and sat there. I almost wet myself."

● A student reported his car, parked in E lot near the stadium, had been broken into Wednesday. The student said he found everything intact but the back seat was loaded with stereos, equalizers and radar detectors.

● A UMass police officer was taken into protective custody Wednesday night after he was found lying face down in a box of donuts near Morrill Science Building, police said. The officer was later treated at University Health Services for severe sugared pastry overdose. Police said they are attributing the "accident" to the fact that it was a "slow night" and the officer had nothing else to do. This is the fourth case of its kind since the beginning of the semester.

Bess Eaton Donuts in Hadley claims their products had nothing to do with the incidents.

● A 19-year-old Lynn man was detained outside of John Adams residence hall Wednesday when officers observed the man carrying a six-pack of Lite beer from Miller into the dorm. Officers advised the man that all the particular brand of beer does is give you headaches and make you fat. The man's beer was confiscated and replaced with a 12-pack of Budweiser the police had confiscated from a professor earlier in the week, police said.

Armed radical disrupts WMUA love program

From Staff Reports

Tense moments gripped the studios of WMUA yesterday as a disturbed member of the Radical Student Union held several station members hostage during a controversial reggae program.

Lefty Wingpink, a junior illegal alien naturalization major, burst into the 'MUA studio at approximately 3:15 p.m. Saturday, disrupting Sister Washme Love None Radio show.

Wielding a Chinese built AK-47 assault rifle, Wingpink took the microphone from Washme, and detailed a list of grievances with the Love None program, and Bill Stepson's Blues For Beelzebub show.

"He just yanked the mike away from me, and started screaming about the Gestapo or something," Washme said. "I told him to just cool out . . . he obviously felt threatened because I'm taller than him," she added.

Wingpink was apparently disturbed by the neo-Nazi overtones often associated with Washme s program. He called for the removal of the show from the air, criminal prosecution of Washme and the removal of beef-strudel from the dining commons' menu.

Wingpink also expressed displeasure with Bill Stepson's satanic blues show. Stepson, who was also in the studio at the time of the incident, claims Wingpink became violent when Washme refused to yield.

"He just kept screaming. Then Washcloth called him a little white man, and he flipped out, started swinging his gun around," Stepson said.

University and Amherst police were notified of the incident, and in minutes swarmed the campus center basement. In a risky move, the officers stormed the studio, and subdued Wingpink with only a minor struggle. Explaining the bold tactics, Director of Public Safety Art Hillside said, "We figured we might lose 35 or 40 percent of the hostages. You know, a number we could live with. Looks like we came out a lot better than we thought."

Shanties to become residential area

By D.H. JONES
Lessor

In a press conference yesterday Governor Michael Dukakis disclosed his intention to help the University of Massachusetts at Amherst combat problems resulting from his recent cuts in the state budget.

Several weeks ago "The Duke" visited the University's Cutback City in response to a petition signed by a large portion of students at the campus inviting him to do so.

Cutback City consists at present of a growing row of student-built shacks in which some students have vowed to reside until the state takes notice of the drastic effects the budget cuts have inflicted upon the university. The governor, however, said he believes the shanties are being used as crack houses.

Gov. Dukakis said students at UMass are willing to put up with just about anything in order to obtain more funds for the library, for classes and for the hiring of more professors, and plans to use Cutback City as a sixth residential area. The money needed by the University, he said, "can be saved, in part, through moving students into these wonderful shacks which require no heating, lighting, water or even custodial staff."

The plan, tentatively scheduled to go into action late in spring, will call for both students and faculty help to aid in the construction of more shacks on both sides of the campus pond, which will serve as a residential water source, he said.

Chancellor Duffey was quoted as saying he anticipates only one possible problem with Dukakis' plan: "I worry that the Cutback City Residential Area may cause conflict within the student body over the fact that those assigned to live in the shacks shall not be required to pay a housing fee." Duffey did say, however, that the students would be asked to contribute what they could to help cover some of the building costs. "The governor himself will be there for half a day to help with the building of the first few shacks," Duffey added. "It's going to be a real rush."

Frank calls for defense cuts

Says government spending in military 'excessive'

By RICK SASSON
Collegian Staff

Barney Frank last night called for a 10 percent shift in spending from defense to domestic, saying our "excessive investment" in the military is a tired idea and could strangle the economy.

The Newton congressman, speaking to a mostly-student audience of about 50 in the Campus Center, pulled no punches in ridiculing conservative Republicans for their policies in areas from national security to abortion.

In the often-humorous ideological talk, Frank focused on US military spending in relation to the Soviet Union, which he called an extremely poor country. He said the time is now ripe, with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev virtually forced to cut defense spending for economic survival, to pursue a steady shift in priorities from weaponry to "technology we'll actually use."

"The Pentagon does enormous things technologically," he said. "The problem is we never use what they make."

"What we've got to do is say 'let's get to a level where we could both decimate each other but do it cheaply,'" he continued. "A lot of my Democratic colleagues are afraid to make the cuts they know are necessary because they are afraid of the political kickback."

But, he added, "I'm convinced the approach is very popular. It's an overtly correct policy."

In his second visit to the University in two years, the Democrat also spoke metaphorically about the United States' relationship with its allies, comparing our protective policies to Mark Twain's novel Tom Sawyer.

"They've got the fence, and we are begging them to let us paint it," he said of our tendency to endow our allies militarily. He also suggested that we reduce our armed troops in Western Europe — now at about 350,000 — to 200,000.

Our current policy in Europe is based on the myth, he said, that Western Europe is still vulnerable to a Soviet invasion.

"How many people would like to be the Russian general leading the Polish and Hungarian army?" he asked. "If the general tried to lead them in a battle they'd shoot him in the ass."

In a question-answer period following the one-hour talk, Frank addressed a bill that would provide the Nicaraguan Contras with a final humanitarian aid package provided they not engage in hostile activity. Although he said he will vote against Contra aid, he called the bill a significant admission by President Bush that "Reagan's war against the Sandinistas is over."

On abortion, Frank said pro-lifers will likely prevail in the Supreme Court, but lose politically in the long run: "I think the pro-choice side, on the whole, is going to win."

Residents, students work for more business taxes

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Several area groups have come together to sponsor a Town Meeting resolution calling for increased taxes in the state to offset the current budget crisis.

"We're not talking about across the board taxation, we're recommending certain taxes that have not been made use of," said Mary Schatzkamer, coordinator of the Gray Panthers of the Pioneer Valley, who are co-sponsoring the resolution with other groups including the University of Massachusetts' Graduate Employee Organization.

Schatzkamer said the tax increases would fall on some 10,000 to 20,000 companies which pay about $450 per year each in taxes and on luxury items such as fur coats.

"We're not trying to penalize small businesses and small corporations," she said. "We're talking about businesses that are not paying their fair share. We're saying a small amount of taxation on these things could make all the difference."

Although Schatzkamer admits that the resolution has no binding effect at the state level and that such a stand on taxes will be contested bitterly by groups such as Citizens for Limited Taxation, she hopes Amherst will set an example for other towns.

"We're hoping that if they [town meeting members] adopt it, others will be encouraged to do the same," she said.

The idea behind the resolution, said Schatzkamer, is to get enough towns adopting similar stands on the issue of taxes and therefore sending a collective message to the state that increasing taxes is not taboo, she said.

"What they [state legislators] need to know from us is there are people out there who want to raise taxes if it is done fairly," she said.

Festa's spending examined

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The Commuter Area Government is reeling in the aftermath of evidence produced this week appearing to indict former president Jay Festa in the "blatant" misuse of $1,500 in student funds during his brief three-month term.

Festa, who could not be reached yesterday, resigned last month and withdrew from the University amid claims of financial improprieties after he failed to meet full-time student academic requirements this semester.

Laura Filkins, treasurer of the Student Government Association, released a report Wednesday night to the student senate detailing Festa's expenditures and said the former president is currently under investigation by the Dean of Students office.

Acting CAG president Robb Smith, former vice president, said he worked closely with Festa but was largely unaware of the vast expenditures, including the $245 purchase of computer games for the CAG office.

Smith said did not think Festa was serious when he presented Smith a catalog this semester and asked him to choose several computer games. But, he said, Festa later filled out a purchase order for the games and had them delivered to the office.

"I thought he was just joking around," said Smith, who advised Festa against opening the games until the CAG govern-

Area bookstores in for academia

By LISA SHAPIRO
Collegian Correspondent

Once upon a time, someone in Europe created the bookstore, a small shop on the corner of a cobblestone road where intellectuals and other curious folks purchased books on philosophy and history, and discussed intellectual and curious thoughts.

Somewhere down the line, however, the chain bookstore was created, and row after row of philosophy was replaced with Harlequin romances. Dostoevsky made room for Jeane Dixon, Keynes for Casey Kasem.

"People here buy books before they buy food," said Albion Bookshop manager Gary Aller, a proponent of the old-fashioned bookstore ideal. "Amherst is a great place to sell books."

Aller said chain bookstores all carry the same types of books, but that isn't the case in Amherst, where self-help books and New York Times best sellers are rarely seen.

Several local booksellers said they try to stock primarily academic books, and feel that specific subject areas have grown strong because of customer input.

"We don't see ourselves in competition with anyone," Aller said. "We try to have the most complete stock and are responsive to community demand. Approximately one-half of our current books have been suggested by customers."

Vigil to be held for crash victims

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

Three University of Massachusetts students are organizing a trip to Washington D.C. this Sunday for a vigil and mass to mourn the victims of Pan Am flight 103.

Chris Gaboury, Mary Pat Bailey and Tom Wiegand are gathering a bus load of students to represent the University as they journey to the nation's capital at the behest of bereaved parents.

They hope to fill a chartered bus with 47 students to attend a Monday morning mass and 2 p.m. vigil that President Bush has promised to attend.

But the three are going as much for themselves as they are for the parents. The trio lost a close friend on the tragic Dec. flight.

Pan Am 103, a 747 jumbo jet, exploded 31,000 feet above Lockerbie, Scotland, when a bomb planted on the plane detonated killing all 258 of the passengers on board and killing 17 more as chunks of debris plummetted down on the town and surrounding Scottish countryside.

Among the passengers of flight 103, bound from London to New York, were 35 Syracuse University students travelling home for the Christmas holiday.

Syracuse student Nicole Boulanger, 21, was among those who died in the crash.

"Geanine Boulanger [Nicole's mother] called us Monday and said representative groups from other universities planned to go to Washington and wondered whether we could organize a group of our own," Wiegand said.

"Nicole for me was an inspiration," said Gaboury. "She was a very talented and beautiful person, inside and out. The fact that someone this young and with a future like hers had to die this way is nothing short of tragic."

Representatives from Boston University, Boston College, Clark University and Holy Cross College have already organized their own trips to Washington, Wiegand said.

The three UMass students have been trying since Monday to raise the $1,500 needed to charter a bus, but as of yesterday only had collected $900.

"We have contacted area governments and house councils for support. We have donation jars placed in the Sylvan Snack Bar and Earthfoods which accompany an explanation what we're doing," Wiegand said.

If the $1,500 is not raised in time, Wiegand said, the group will get to the services by van. Right now, he said, there are 20 to 30 people committed to going.

Officials investigating the crash found evidence of a highly destructive form of plastic explosive which was planted on board the plane in a radio cassette player.

A warning concerning a bomb to be placed on a Pan Am flight within two weeks was received Dec. 5 by the U.S. Embassy in Helsinki, Finland, but was not disseminated to the public.

"I was planning on going to England to study but I'm terrified to do it now," said student organizer Mary Pat Bailey, who said she is outraged that Americans have been attacked in such a way that the airways are now unsafe.

Worthing makes students his business

By BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Correspondent

"Being in an academic setting and working with and around students can be very rewarding," said Parker Worthing, associate dean in the School of Management.

Worthing moved to Amherst with his family in 1967 to begin a career with the University of Massachusetts School of Management. Beginning as a professor of marketing, he was chairman of the department for six years, and took on his current role in the fall semester of 1985.

A 1962 graduate of the University of Maine at Orono, Worthing said that his interest in the business field evolved through graduate work at Cornell and Michigan.

"I became increasingly interested in pursuing the educational side of business," he said. "It is a rewarding and fulfilling way to develop a career."

Though he never pursued a career in corporate business, he said "it's not like you are completely away [from corporate business] if you are teaching in this area."

Worthing said he feels that to overcoming challenges one must trying to engage faculty, administrators and students in a discussion of "what the problems are and, with our resources, what we can do to minimize the problems."

Under Worthing's guidance, the SOM program and SOM students have undergone many changes.

PROFILE

"There is a new SOM placement office," he said, "and we have a new director of development. This fall we also added a new director of minority management education."

Changes among SOM students include an increase in the number of students who elect to go on a co-op and internship placements who choose to study abroad, he said.

Worthing said he encourages SOM students to take a variety of courses other than in business to prepare them for the real world.

"It will strengthen the preparation for career and life after. They will become more skillful in terms of appreciating different points of view," he said.

Worthing said that SOM here "compares very well" to other universities. One reason is that UMass offers degrees at three levels — undergraduate, MBA and Ph.D — with the "selectivity of choosing a major."

He said that another plus is that most undergraduate courses are taught by faculty in manageable sizes. This achievement is attributed to "a lot of dedicated, hard-working people."

Worthing said for now he intends to stay at UMass. "There are enough important challenges here that are deserving of my attention. If I can make a contribution then that is satisfying. There is always more to be done, more challenges ahead."

New SGA president goes to work

By MARIA SACCHETTI

In her first 10 days as president of the Student Government Association, Tracy Davis has managed to secure the purchase of 35 revamped emergency telephones that will also be available for non-emergency use.

Davis, who issued her report after a two-hour meeting this week with Arthur Hilson, director of public safety, said the new phones will serve as non-emergency campus phones and will also have an "emergency" button for direct connection with campus police.

Installation of the phones is slated for later next month, and Davis said she expects the equipment will be placed in "centralized, highly-visible areas."

Davis said her office is also working on the establishment of a student, faculty and staff advisory committee for public safety, to be coordinated by student Jason Eros.

In other SGA business:

- The SGA is opening the search for a student attorney general. Applications are available in room 406 in the Student Union building and the return deadline is April 14 at 5 p.m.
- Davis encouraged former candidates for SGA president and student trustee to join a massive cleanup effort of campaign posters and similar materials. Student Trustee-elect Eric Nakajima and Davis will provide trash bags for the attempt, she said.
- Sens. Dan Chesnicka, Jason Kofman and Shana Corby were elected to the SGA nominating-sub committee, which screens applications and determines which committee each senator will serve on.
- A Presidential Advisory Council involving people from all area governments is being established, Davis said.
- Former Sen. John Dunlap, also former co-president of the Northeast Area Government, was sworn in as Senate Speaker this week, and Laura Filkins began her second term as SGA Treasurer.

Activist criticizes press bias

The Palestinian Liberation Organization's war against Israel is waged artificially through the American press, a media activist told 30 people in the Campus Center Wednesday night.

Dr. Charles Jacobs, director of the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA), said there has been a change in the media's approach to Middle East coverage, with sympathies now leaning toward Palestinians in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"Over the last 15 months, the story the world has been told has shifted," Jacobs said. "The old story line was 'How can tiny Israel with three and a half million Jews possibly survive stuck in the midst of hostile territory of 190 million surrounding Moslems, given that it is blasphemous in the Moslem religion for there to exist any Jewish state on holy Arab soil?'"

Jacobs said this has changed, and the perspective has "shrunk."

"Instead of the huge map of the Middle East which has tiny Israel stuck in the middle, the focus is on Israel and the Palestinians . . . a smaller branch of 190 million Arabs who have declared that they don't want any Jewish state."

"I think of the case of Salman Rushdie and I think that the Islamic world put a contract on the state of Israel as soon as it began," he said.

"There is no time in 15-second TV spots to do history and geography," said Jacobs. Without this background information, people can attach whatever

Author's childhood tales amuse audience at Smith

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Correspondent

Should Maurice Sendak, celebrated illustrator and author of Where the Wild Things Are, wish to change professions and come a stand-up comedian, he could easily do so.

Sendak and his sharp wit kept an audience of over 500 people in stitches at Smith College Wednesday night, as he related his childhood memories, his experiences as a beginning writer and the part his Jewish heritage has played in his life.

"I knew from the time I was five years old, when my sister and brother and I would write stories together, that I wanted to be a writer," he said. "My father was upset by this, because he came to America to have a Miss America and two football players. Instead, he ended up with three green-faced throwbacks to the old country who did nothing but sit around the house and read books."

From this beginning, Sendak got his first break at age 17.

"My science teacher was working on a book titled Atomics for the Millions. He told me that if I illustrated the book, I would get $50 and a passing grade," Sendak said. "So began a promising career."

And a promising career it was. In spite of his lack of any technical art training, Sendak had already had nearly a half dozen books published by the time Where the Wild Things Are was publishing board was notified of the transaction.

Smith, who has since used the games, said Festa allegedly opened the games after assuring him that the games were approved and would attract more students to the office.

"I trusted Jay and that's what hurts about a lot of this stuff," he said. "Maybe I was too much like George Bush when Jay was around, I was too loyal."

The acting president also claimed he knew nothing either of Festa's personal expenditures, totalling nearly $100, but added that the former president of the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Association was "very poor" and under much emotional strain because of continual verbal attacks and death threats.

"I don't know why he did some of this stuff but I think there's psychological reasons," Smith said. "He was having a very rough time."

Smith defended the $700 expenditure for appliances including a "boom box" radio, a coffee maker, a refrigerator and an answering machine, claiming Festa was attempting an "office beautification" project. He also defended the purchase of a $32 batik tapestry because all of the proceeds allegedly benefited a battered women's shelter, he said.

But, Smith admitted that a $307.50 artwork purchase, of which he claimed ignorance, was excessive and possibly double the amount the CAG had originally planned to spend.

"I don't think there was malicious intent [by Festa]," Smith said. "The purchases are questionable, not illegal. They just shouldn't have been bought."

Smith said he has been working to stabilize the CAG during the past few weeks and spoke of the recent release of the government's funds, which were frozen by the senate pending Filkins' investigation, as a positive event.

"I am not corrupt," Smith said of his position as acting president. "I've been trying really hard to turn this around.

New toxic cleanup plan uses plants, animals

By STEPHEN PANGIONE
Collegian Correspondent

By combining many different kinds of plants, ranging from microscopic algae to flowering plants, in several different places throughout the treatment process, he has found wastewater can be almost completely neutralized by the plants, he said.

John Todd's mission in life is to recreate the harmony between nature and human culture. He said his "revolutionary" process of wastewater treatment is a huge step in this direction.

The process he invented to effectively treat wastewater, such as sewage, uses plants and animals to purify otherwise toxic materials found in wastewater, he told 200 people Wednesday night at Hampshire College's Franklin Patterson Hall.

"Some people call this the spaceship approach to technology," he said. "Human survival is a stake if something is not done about it."

Todd, 49, said his system works with nature instead of against it, he said. Currently the way waste, such as sludge, is treated is by mixing it with chemicals that neutralize the toxins. However, these chemicals can be deadlier to the environment than the untreated sludge, he said.

"The U.S. has spent almost $100 billion improperly treating waste since 1974," he said. Todd said his technique is more economically sound because the only by-products created are living plants.

Todd has done research on hundreds of different types of plants and animals and the nutrients they use to survive, and has come up with surprising results, he said. "Many of the toxins we extract with chemicals can be extracted by certain plants which need them to survive."

The system is comprised of several different tanks filled with plants. Wastewater is pumped in one side of the tanks and is filtered through each tank, he said. Each tank is stocked with plants to take out specific materials from the water. Once the water has gone through each tank, the end result is clean water.

Todd has already established his system in New England areas.

Sugarbush Mountain, a Vermont ski resort, uses the technique developed from Todd. They have to deal with an enormous amount of sewage from the thousands of people that visit each season, he said. He built a treatment plant for them and "they are ecstatic with the results so far," he said.

A second treatment plant is scheduled to open in June in Providence, R.I., and Harwich, Mass. will vote in May on the construction of a treatment plant, he said.

Todd is the co-founder of The New Alchemy Institute on Cape Cod, which does research in perfecting his technique. He graduated from Montreal's McGill University with a degree in agriculture and parasitology, and received his doctorate in Fisheries and Animal Behavior from University of Michigan. He has taught at several universities and has worked at Woods Hole Institute on Cape Cod.

Just one letter could make the difference

What's in a name?

Well, for Ismail Mehmedov Hyuseinov, it has meant spending the past four years in a Bulgarian prison.

In January of 1985, Mr. Hyuseinov was arrested by the Bulgarian government for refusing to change his Islamic name to a Bulgarian one. As if the reason for the arrest and subsequent imprisonment of Mr. Hyuseinov isn't foolish enough, this act is in violation of Article 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which Bulgaria ratified in 1970.

Now, Mr. Hyuseinov isn't trying to change the world, nor is he trying to make any political statements. He's only a man who thinks that the government should not be able to tell him what his name can, or can not be. If you agree with him, please write a letter requesting the immediate and unconditional release of Mr. Ismail Mehmedov Hyuseinov.

Of course you're probably thinking, what difference can my letter possibly make? Well, the following was written by a prisoner of conscience in Uraguay, who was released through letter writing efforts by Amnesty International, "In this road covered with roses and thorns, you represent the roses and they are so beautiful that I don't feel the pain that the thorns cause me. What this relationship means . . . I don't think you can imagine because it is greater than anything you can think. Every new letter, every word, touches me so much that my eyes fill with tears."

So please know that you can make a difference. Don't let a man die in prison for something as foolish as a name.

Please write a letter to the Bulgarian government politely requesting the release of Mr. Ismail Mehmedov Hyuseinov. In that letter, mention the violation of Article 27, but don't mention things like how this could not happen in America, because they really don't care.

But I thank you for caring.

Pro-life means helping unborn and women

This past Tuesday night (March 28), a debate took place between Phyllis Schlafly and Judy Goldsmith on the controversial subject of abortion. We would like to express our appreciation for both of these women who boldly discussed an issue which, as was evident Tuesday evening, threatened so many and spawned an atmosphere of anger and hostility.

We feel that Mrs. Schlafly made a very good point concerning the nature of abortion, specifically that it involves the taking of human life. However, we were appalled at her apparent lack of compassion for the women involved in abortions and crisis pregnancies.

We feel that everyone should know that there are "pro-lifers" out there who do actually care about such women. They offer support to women with crisis pregnancies by offering them clothes, housing, counselling and anything else that they might need in order to carry their baby to term. We understand that this is a very difficult situation, and offer our help.

Still, we maintain that we, as a society, need to come to grips with what is right. If the unborn have a right to life (they have just as much right as anyone else, even though they cannot argue their own case) then we need act on that conviction and uphold it regardless of the difficulty of our circumstances.

Based upon this stand, we need to develop programs which do, in fact, support pregnant women and their children. It is everyone's responsibility to act with compassion toward both baby and mother. Pro-lifers are not against women or freedom, but they are against the taking of an innocent human life.

We urge all of those who would discuss the very emotional issue of abortion to respect all human life, born and unborn, and to treat everyone with sacrificial compassion.

Dollars versus bronze bodies

For many people, it takes months to decide just what to do or where to go for spring break. Some people are torn between going to Florida or the Carribean, while others opt for Cancun or California. But no matter where in this hemisphere they go, there are one or two major factors to think about: getting the darkest possible tan in the shortest amount of time without acquiring skin cancer, and what their bank accounts will look like when the sunsets and volleyball games subside after those exciting seven days.

Douglas Banks

Luckily, I didn't have to worry about that. This year, when the time came to make that important decision of where to go, my choice was home. Yes, rather than a tan, I wanted money. My thoughts were that by the end of the week in Daytona or Jamaica, all I would have to show for it would be a great tan and a higher tolerance for alcohol.

But a fat wallet can open many more opportunities. I could buy something large, or save my windfall and use it in small, wise portions. I thought it would be fun seeing my family and neighborhood friends for a week, which, of course, it was. But I forgot one small detail — work.

Between Monday and Friday, I woke up at 6 a.m., crawled into that familiar old shower, made a bag lunch and headed to work.

Little did I realize the highway I travelled when commuting 10 miles every day to work would be jammed every morning due to construction. The city so thoughtfully decided to repair potholes, as my car kept reminding me just how tardy I was. Upon arrival, I was grateful my boss believes in the old adage, "Work begins when your first cup of coffee is empty."

So, after drinking a very slow cup of coffee, I began what was to be forty hours of what I like to call Facilities Specialist, a quaint euphemism for a maintenance person.

Day after day I clamped table tops, filled executive water coolers, ate my favorite lunch of pb & j, and spent the afternoons building cabinets and painting picnic tables. There were a few good things about working, though. There was no dress code, and the check at the end of the week dangled in front of me like the proverbial carrot on a stick. And I did manage to go out with my friends on a few occasions, so my social life was not completely dead.

But now that is all over. All of us have been submerged into our weekly routine of classes and my attitude is changing. Two weeks ago, it was easy to ask, "What do I need a tan for?" I was no darker, nor lighter than anyone else and the only thoughts I had were how disgustingly poor everyone gets before and after spring break.

At the time, I didn't think of the social value that a Coppertone tan carried, nor did I realize that no matter how much I earn during break, could it be possible to flaunt my "riches" when I've barely made enough for the coming month?

With these small thoughts meandering in and out of my head, my vision of happiness ceased to look like dollar signs and began to take on the appearance of bikinis and beachballs. I now wake up every morning to the tanned face of my roommate. While walking to class, in my paleness, I can always daydream of the money in my bank account that none of those beach dwellers have. But when it comes right down to it, I have a strong feeling I would trade all of the money I earned that week for a deep, dark tan.

Re-establishing an old friendship

My parents decided recently to sell my bedroom furniture.

They had asked for, and received, my consent, as the furniture was about 10 years old, and they promised to replace it with new furnishings.

Since I was home for spring break, I decided to go through my desk drawers and throw away as much junk as possible. I don't know why I made that decision, other than it seemed like a "ritual" one should perform before losing their belongings.

It was useless junk anyway.

I found my acceptance letter from the University of Massachusetts (boy did they make a mistake) among the notes, old report cards and other paraphernalia. Beats me why I ever wanted to save some of these things — except that I'm not one to empty the garbage. By stuffing my drawers with broken Walkmans, pencils and paper clips, perhaps I'm subconsciously avoiding the task.

Under a caligraphy book I was given for my Bar Mitzvah, I found a pile of letters and envelopes — stationery I had not seen since I moved to New Jersey in 1984.

Numerous letters were in the pile from someone I had forgotten; she was a high school friend from Illinois.

David R. Mark

The last of the letters from Anita was dated Oct. 31, 1984. I had put off writing back — she gave up on my never-to-be-sent letter — and our friendship of three years came to an abrupt end.

She was not my best friend in Illinois, just someone I ate lunch with and worked with in the drama club. She wasn't "everybody's best friend," and she never went on dates, with me or anyone else. That's probably why she kept in touch with me for nine months, and similarly why I responded.

It was a friendship best suited for lonely people.

Unfortunately for our friendship, I moved on. By the time that last letter arrived 4½ years ago, I had made new friends, and most probably felt tied down to writing to Illinois.

So why should I now consider writing?

I'm not sure. I feel like a heel for not returning her message. And with 4½ years of hiatus, enough things have happened to me to write a decent letter.

Maybe it's because, after 4½ years, I've come to accept Illinois as part of my life. Something I wanted to rid myself of five years ago, even as I longed for it, is now a memory I can live comfortably with.

Maybe I've seen one too many ABC Afternoon Specials. . . . Friends are hard to come by and easy to lose. I'm writing to Anita, and I hope five years isn't 4½ years too many.

BU running Chelsea schools nears reality

CHELSEA, MASS (AP) — Teachers say it's illegal and the state's top educator has called it a tragedy, but the School Committee in this impoverished city has formally embraced an unprecendented plan under which Boston University will run its schools.

The committee voted 4-2 on Wednesday to approve the 10-year contract, which now heads to lawmakers for consideration. First the city's aldermen must pass a home rule petition asking the Legislature for enabling legislation.

The aldermen are expected to give the move their blessings and home rule petitions customarily pass muster when there is strong local support. In this case, the Chelsea-BU arrangement is fully supported by Rep. Richard Voke, D-Chelsea, one of the most powerful people in the House.

Still, Peter Greer, dean of the BU School of Education and the project's director, said Thursday it was premature to assume the plan will reach fruition.

"We're not counting our chickens," Greer said.

He cited opposition in court from teachers and concerns raised in recent weeks by Hispanic parents worried how their youngsters will fare under the BU plan. Greer said it was encouraging that Hispanic parents are showing such concern, and their fears will be addressed.

The vote Wednesday, however, followed a stormy meeting in which School committee member Anthony Tiro walked out in anger and several members of the Hispanic community chanted, "We say no."

Under the plan, BU will raise money from private sources and use students and faculty from its School of Education to upgrade management and operations in Chelsea's 3,300-pupil system.

The contract allows the School Committee to override BU policy decisions by a two-thirds vote. The committee can also terminate the contract by a simple majority vote.

Strongest opposition has come from Chelsea teachers, the Massachusetts Federation of Teachers and the American Federation of Teachers, who have filed a suit to block the unusual marriage of private university and public school system. They charge it's unconstitutional.

Union Program Council's Emotion show tonight

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Staff

Tonight, top Ulster combo That Petrol Emotion will be exploding into the Student Union Ballroom. I last saw these fabulous punk funksters last year at my own student union in Glasgow. Of course there was an open bar then, and it always helps you appreciate the music if you've 'ad a few' before the gig, if you know what I mean, but by the time these mothers had blasted through a set which included everything from the infectious groove (manic pop thrill you could almost say) of the early- Clash-like "Big Decision" and "It's a Good Thing," through a tangle of Sonic Youth-style whammy-bars, right to the industrial funk/hip-hop stylin' of the likes of "Genius Move," I knew I had seen something mighty impressive in action.

That Petrol Emotion came into being after the demise of The Undertones (the night John Peel cried himself to sleep) - creators of such megawonderful moments in the history of poular music as "Teenage Kicks" and "Jimmy Jimmy" - when lead singer Feargal Sharkey swapped his polo-neck for a Gaultier suit and a chance to be produced by Dave "Satan" Stewart" of the by this time desperately ungroovy and otherwise completely crap Eurythmics.

In comes Irish-American pop-fiend and complete nutter Steve Mack to give the boys the direction they needed. The result was Manic Pop Thrill an uneven, but at times brilliant album which the British music press hailed as one of the most impressive debut records of 1985.

But this was to be shortly eclipsed by the band's second album on which they added the forces of rap and funk to their post-punk sound, a move perhaps prompted by the state of the independent music scene at the time, a myriad of desperately twee jangly guitar outfits like Tallulah Gosh and The Close Lobsters - the anorak bands as they were sometimes called - who thought that alternative meant pretending you were sixteen again, shopped at Oxfam and wrote songs about flying kites and being generally pathetic in the rain.

Now most of those bands have either gone the way of my breakfast or formed themselves into trendy acid-house outfits (what is an acid house outfit?), determined to get their fifteen microwaves of fame in the lower reaches of the charts. The general move to dance culture in the UK has meant that there are now very few bands who can still get out on stage and crank up a noise that doesn't sound like your mum's dishwasher on the blink. That Petrol Emotion are one such a band. Their new album End of the Millenium Psychosis Blues has added psychedelia to the list of influences they have squeezed through the mangler into their uniquely poppy but hard sound. This is one band that in my opinion does not deserve the hideous reward of CMJ endorsement.

But don't take my word for it. Get yer butt in gear and down to the S.U.B tonight to hear That Petrol Emotion get volatile. Believe me, this show is gonna be a complete gas.

Deserving films get the shaft at the Oscars

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

I don't know why I watch all these glitzy Hollywood awards shows. All they do is piss me off. Every year I sit myself down in front of the television and say, 'This year, it's going to be different. This year, those who deserve to win are going to win.'

THE SCREENING ROOM

As I prepared myself to watch the academy awards, I sincerely believed that this year would be the year. With movies such as Working Girl, A Fish Called Wanda, and Accidental Tourist up for major awards, it semmed that the academy had shed its artsy, wholier-than-thou image, and begun to appreciate movies for their content instead of their subject matter.

My spirits were lifted even higher when Geena Davis (Accidental Tourist) won best supporting actress, and Kevin Kline (A Fish Called Wanda) won best supporting actor. Both were well deserved, but probably would have gone unnoticed in earlier years.

Then Rainman took over. I have no problem with Dustin Hoffman winning best actor. He is a brilliant method actor. Even though he plays a one dimensional character, he has every idiosyncrasy down perfectly, and is deserving of the award.

Barry Levinson(Rainman) winning best diector is another story. How difficult can it be to direct the great Dustin Hoffman? How difficult can it be to have Tom Cruise play the same role he's played in every other movie he's been in? It is much more difficult to bring out the subtle character development and story line that Lawrence Kasdan achieves so beautifully in Accidental Tourist.

Rainman did not even deserve to be nominated for best picture. Take away Hoffman's performance and the subject matter of autism, and you're left with nothing more than a string of scenes in which Hoffman demonstrates his remarkable talents with numbers. The storyline, in which Cruise learns to love his autistic brother, is so predictable that is insulting to the audience.

The same is true of Alan Parker's Mississippi Burning. It deals with the controversial issue of race relations, and is backed by an intense performance from Gene Hackman. The movie is not as gripping as Parker's earlier effort, Angel Heart, which was overlooked at Oscar time. But a film that deals with the occult and shows Cosby protege Lisa Bonet engaging in some rather kinky sex will never be considered for an Oscar.

Even Working Girl, although an excellent film that deserves the best picture nomination, has the timely subject matter of a woman making it in a man's world, as well as a dynamic performance from Melanie Griffith (although she was even better in the often overlooked Something Wild).

Today, movies are nominated on the basis of one acting performance and on depicting a current issue in a positive vein. Movies such as Last Temptation of Christ are too controversial. But who is going to come out and say they are against Blacks, women, or autistic people?

Movies such as the erotic Unbearable Lightness of Being, off-beat Married to the Mob, and disturbing Talk Radio do not fit into this mold and were unfairly excluded from the awards. A movie such as Accidental Tourist, which was too good to be overlooked at nomination time, had no chance of winning best picture. But the good old-fashioned love story, in which Geena Davis slowly unravels William Hurt's personality to himself as well as to us, is a movie we will remember long after Rainman is forgotten.

H Metal rip off warrants abuse

By DANIELLE DOWLING

Dirty Rotten Filthy Stinking Rich
Warrant
Columbia

In the music industry, when an idea or sound works and sells plenty of albums, there are many copy-cat bands waiting to capitalize on this success. This most definitely applies when describing the debut album of the new but cliche L.A. group Warrant. They are both shocking and insulting in the way they borrow sounds from groups like Van Halen and the Cars. It's one thing to be influenced by different musicians and still stay original, but it's entirely another to steal ideas that have already been successfully used. It mocks the intelligence of the music-consuming public.

Record Review

"Down Boys," which has received both radio and MTV airplay, is especially revolting. When I first heard it, I was under the impression it was a cover of an old Cars tune ("Bye Bye Love").
It's almost plagiaristic.

As for the rest of the album, one word that comes to mind is predictable. It follows that same type of tired commercial metal formula that was inspired by the success of Van Halen, Motley Crue and Bon Jovi. The lyrics are insipid and innane. The title track tells us: "I'm gonna have more money than you've ever seen/baby I just want all the frills/i'm gonna insulate my body in green/I'm gonna light my cigarettes with hundred dollar bills." Now, isn't that just a deep and meaningful comment on today's society? The lyrics are only printed for this one song. The record company must be real confident in the lyrical talent of this band.

The guitar riffs scream, "Please don't play me anymore. I've been played enough times and it's getting a little dull!!"

If this wasn't bad enough, every song on the album starts with the lead singer screaming "Oh yeah!!" No kidding. To top it all off, they don't just have one sickening power ballad, but two, "Sometimes She Cries" and "Heaven." They're sure to be hits on MTV if they have an ample amount of girls scantily dressed in negligees or if they have enough people with their lighters lit in a live audience shot.

To sum it up, listening to this album was truly a torturous but forgettable experience. Don't buy it!

Sanders said to likely turn professional

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) — Heisman Trophy winner Barry Sanders has talked with an agent and likely will turn pro, testing the NFL's restrictions against drafting underclassmen, The Associated Press learned yesterday.

A pro football source said Sanders will be represented by David Ware, an Atlanta-based agent, to negotiate his contract. However, it wasn't clear whether he had formally signed with Ware.

Neither Sanders nor his parents were available for comment. Ware was also unavailable.

Sanders, a running back, will announce his decision at news conference in Denver on Saturday.

Joni Jay Samuels, of All Pro Sports and Entertainment, which called the news conference, said she had no idea why the news conference was called. She said the organization represents Sanders' brother Byron, a Northwestern senior, and that their parents had asked All Pro Sports and Entertainment, to arrange the news conference.

In January, the NCAA placed Oklahoma State on four years probation, barring the Cowboys from bowl games for the next three years and live television for the next two.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You approach a financial situation with both trepidation and hope. Romance will affect the decisions you make this evening. Your timing in business is excellent. Look for a raise in the near future.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Concentration will be easier if you seek quiet surroundings. You feel more secure where your financial future is concerned. Foreign business travel results in higher profits. Renew your passport and pack a bag!

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Ignore any signs of ill humor in your loved ones and their moods will soon improve. Involvement in a community venture holds special appeal. Beware of taking on too much, however.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Tend to routine matters early in the day. Someone who works behind the scenes is very supportive. Mutual resources could be a source of dissension between you and your romantic partner. Protect joint funds.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct.22): The news from afar should be encouraging. You and partner will have to compromise in order to avoid a serious quarrel. Talk things over quietly. If still undecided, get an independent opinion.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Keep appointments on time. Attending a social event lets you cultivate influential people who can help your career. Secret transactions contain many pitfalls. Be cautious when making new commitments. Investigate potential partners.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Be aware of mate's priorities as well as your own. An argumentative co-worker should be ignored. Leave any work tensions at the office and spend a quiet evening relaxing at home.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Keep your temper in check or you could jeopardize an important opportunity. You find yourself drawn into an exciting relationship with someone you previously overlooked. The future looks brighter than ever!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You had better take stock of your priorities before plotting future moves. Research and experts' opinions will help you make the right decision. You are ready to do what needs to be done.

Softball heads to UConn

Minutewomen want to come back swinging

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

What's the saying. . . get right back on the horse, or bike, or whatever? Well, for the University of Massachusetts softball team, it's time to get jump back onto the diamond this weekend following last week's 3-13 swing through California.

Weather permitting, the Minutewomen will travel to Storrs Ct. on Saturday to participate in the third annual University of Connecticut "Huskie Invitational."

Squads from Princeton and Central Connecticut State University will join host UConn and UMass in the double elimination tournament. The Minutewomen are scheduled to face Princeton Saturday afternoon in first round play.

The Minutewomen have made the trek south all three years that the tournament has been staged. Last season, UMass was beaten in the weekend's championship game 3-2 by the UConn. Both teams then went on to post 30 win seasons, finishing 2nd and 3rd in the NCAA Northeast Regional final rankings. The road trip is keeping with the Minutewomen's theme of playing tough teams early in the season (UMass saw enough top 20 material in California to last a lifetime). Princeton enters play as the third ranked team in the Northeast with record of 11-5, while the Huskies (7-5) currently occupy the top spot in the region.

Coach Elaine Sortino rested the troops this week after the team returned from California with a large collection of bumps and bruises. Saturday's return to play now becomes the Minutewomen's unveiling in regional play, and a chance to show what they picked up in a week's worth of work against the best teams in the country.

C's get help for a "Song"

BOSTON (AP) — The injury-ravaged Boston Celtics wanted another shooting guard. Otis Birdsong wanted another chance. They both got their wish.

Birsong, out of the NBA since last season, flew into Boston late Tuesday night, made his Celtic debut late in the first quarter of Wednesday night's 106-97 win over Portland and may help the team's late-season playoff drive.

"I could have gone overseas but I think I can still play in this league," the third leading scorer in New Jersey Nets history said. "Until I feel otherwise, I'm going to give it a shot."

The Celtics' hopes of catching Philadelphia for the seventh Eastern Conference playoff berth and keeping ninth-place Washington from knocking them out of the final spot, suffered a blow when guard Jim Paxson underwent season-ending wrist surgery Tuesday. Forwards Larry Bird and Kevin McHale already were sidelined.

So for the third time this season, the Celtics looked to the continental Basketball Association for Backcourt help. They previously had picked up the inexperienced Kevin Gamble and Kelvin Upshaw, both still with the team.

The 33-year-old Birdsong, who had been with the Tulsa Fast Breakers after 11 NBA seasons, signed a 10-day contract with Boston Wednesday. A 50.6 percent career shooter, the Celtics hope he fills the outside shooting void left by Paxson's injury.

"We're low in numbers right now and I think we need as much experience and as much help as we can get," starting guard Brian Shaw, a rookie, said. "He's played in the league for a long time. He's familiar with a lot of the players and just the NBA style. Especially for us young guys, we can learn something from him also."

Rugby team ready to knock heads is season opener

By DAN SARAZEN
Collegian Correspondent

Rugby, the University's best kept sports secret and second largest team only to the football team, goes back into action tomorrow against the University of Rhode Island and Maine. Looking to improve on last fall's eight wins and four losses, the team is faced with numerous challenges.

The first challenge will be to get the entire team in shape. Assistant coach Francis Buttle said he wants this year's team to be "disciplined, fast, and powerful." The larger challenge will be to train and educate a largely inexperienced squad on the finer points of rugby.

University of Massachusetts head coach Robert Laurence has been coaching rugby at UMass for 20 years and sees this team as being very new to the game — of the teams 32 freshmen on the team, only three have experience.

Despite the novelty of the game to many of his players Laurence sees this upcoming season optimistically, "The team is smart . . . the team is built on support," he said. Much of the burden will lie on key returning players.

One of the players who will carry a heavy load is last year's captain and center, Jeff Burrill. Burrill was chosen to the representative team for the Northeast collegian squad last year. Also returning is this year's captain Kevin Turner, a junior. Other players expected to contribute are back Tim Robinson and senior Jack Macarthy who was called "strong and mean" by Buttle.

Two exchange students will figure in the make up of the team; Peter Bryson is a flanker from northern Ireland and Gary Williams is a fly half from Wales. Both bring valuable experience to the team.

If the team has a weakness it would be the lack of finishing speed. With the loss of Tom Marinello, last year's fastest player, the team may have to rely on power and wit. The team does still have some speed and Buttle said, "We have not come up against anyone faster yet."

Another player who stands to make an impression on the opposition is Eric Olsen. Laurence called Olsen, "One of the best collegian props in the country." And look for Olsen to be a leader on the field.

Rugby has been called a mental as well as a physical puzzle. Contrary to popular belief, rugby is a sport of intellect as well as strength. Of the last twenty four captains, twelve have PHDs, and two are now MDs. In England, rugby is called 'a game for hooligans played by gents."

The game is becoming more popular in the US. There are over 25,000 players in the states and although most of the teams are in club leagues, more high school and women's squads are popping up. In New England, there are 10 high school teams and 32 womens teams.

The U.S. is even closing ranks in national competition, and now finds itself in the class of Argentina and Rumania.

The best way to find out about Rugby would be to go see a game for yourself. So head down to the lower Boyden field tomorrow at noon and see the games, coach Laurence promises, "you'll see some exciting action".

Baseball enters A-10 play as it travels to Philly

Trip to St.Joe's tomorrow is first league test

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team will jump into the heart of its schedule this weekend when it travels to Philadelphia to open the Atlantic 10 Conference season against St. Joseph's University.

UMass, 5-6, will square off with the Hawks in doubleheaders starting at noon tomorrow and Sunday.

Even though it's early in the season, this is an important series for both teams, as each A-10 team plays four games against each of the other four teams in its division. The top two teams from each division make the playoffs.

"When it comes to conference games, we always go in saying we want to win four," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "But it may be tough because we have a young team."

No, it's not the same UMass team that handled St. Joe's with relative ease last season, winning three of the four games. In Tuesday's game against UConn, four freshmen started for the Minutemen.

Derrick Dana did a good job behind the plate, Glen DiSarcina and Kevin Correa looked solid in the middle infield, and Brian Bright contributed two hits, including a home run.

But senior co-captain Dave Telgheder, UMass' top pitcher, lasted just 4⅓ innings against the Huskies, allowing five earned runs.

St. Joe's hasn't been as strong as the 7-6 Huskies this year, though.

The Hawks are 5-11, including eight games in Orlando on their Southern trip, and are coming off an 18-4 loss to Villanova. Their top hitter, junior outfielder Mike Migliarese, is hitting .404.

UMass has five players hitting better than .300, led by Brian Donovan at .571.

Men's lax gears up for the Redmen

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

All was not lost for the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team after Wednesday's bitter 12-11 loss to Cornell.

The Gorillas are using that game as a learning experience, and will carry over their lessons into tomorrow's clash with St. John's University in Jamaica, NY (2 p.m.).

UMass feels that it has cured whatever ails it had, and is ready to take on the Redmen tomorrow.

St. John's comes into the game with a 1-4 record, paling in comparison to the 3-1 mark and seventh national ranking owned by the Gorillas. However, UMass coach Dick Garber knows that his team can't take St. John's lightly.

"They beat Duke (9-8 in overtime in the season opener), which is a good team," Garber said. "They're a young team but they feel they're ready for Division I play. I think we're stronger than St. John's, but they've been in every game at halftime. It's a team we should beat, but not like the ones in California."

The Gorillas do have some advantages. One is their depth, especially at attack, which became evident toward the end of the Cornell game. Had the game gone on another five minutes, UMass probably could have overtaken Cornell.

"The last 10 minutes we had them (Cornell) on their knees. They were really sucking mud," Garber said. "With our depth we're capable of beating anybody."

And Garber feels that the Redmen's one weakness plays right into UMass' lap, that being their defense in the transition.

"In broken situations we can really create the fast break and transition game," he said. "Once they settle into a 6-on-6 they're not too bad."

One problem for the Gorillas may be the Omni-turf field St. John's plays on. Whereas normal AstroConcrete does wacky things like making baseballs bounce 50 feet in the air, this fake stuff is the complete opposite.

"The ball doesn't bounce. It's OK to run on, but it's tough scooping the ball and taking bounce shots," Garber said. "It fools the goalie because he expects it to bounce up, but then it just skips like a rock on water."

Which could be a big test for UMass goalkeeper Sal LoCascio. The Lindenhurst, NY native is one of several Gorillas from the New York/Long Island area who will be making a homecoming of sorts.

Opposite LoCascio in the nets for the Redmen will be Sal LoBosco, another Long Islander and a decent netminder in his own right, according to Garber. This season, LoBosco has allowed 10.5 goals per game while posting a 61.3 save percentage.

Leading the attack for coach Bill Miltenberg's Redmen will be Russell Hilton (seven goals, five assists) and Brian Bugge (6-5).

Gymnasts qualify

Baxter and Grady head for NE regional

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Erika Baxter and Kim Grady will travel to Pennsylvania State University this weekend to represent the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics program the the Northeast Regional Tournament.

Baxter averaged 36.63 points in all-around competition during the regular season, and will be seeded fifth of seven individual performers this weekend. Grady will travel and suit up as an alternate, and would compete only if a slot opens up; her 36.34 average fell .06 points shy of the top seven.

Grady had been on track to qualify in the top seven right up until the season's final few meets. But when Grady, who is a freshman, slipped in the standings, she was unable to overcome some stingy scoring at Temple last weekend.

"Sometimes I think that the best thing that can happen to you is not to make it," said coach Alfie Mitchell. "She should be there - she hit her best routines last weekend and just didn't get the scores. It should be a little added edge next year. She'll be back.

"But her only question is maturity; Kim's just a little green and over the season it took it's toll."

Baxter, a junior, was thrust into the role of team leading scorer this season when classmate Kristin Turmail was injured. Baxter responded with her best winter to date, and her first invitation to the post-season tournament.

"I'm real happy," she said, "though it would have been nice for the whole team to go. If Kritin had been there, the team would have had a better chance."

Baxter may has set an example that Grady would be wise to follow, rebounding from a tough season last year climb within sight of the top this year. "She may not have admitted it to others, but from the beginning Erika has had her eye on qualifying for regionals," said Mitchell. "I'm proud of what she did this year."

"The difference this season was attitude... before, when things went bad, she would give up. This year she has much more polish and maturity."

Baxter hopes to finish as an "all-East" selection in an individual event by finishing in the top three. Short of that, she said, "I just hope to do my best."

Tennis teams home today against the Aloha state

Women vs Hawaii

By BRAD HALFOND
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team heads into this weekend's matches looking to gain some experience and confidence for the season ahead.

The Minutewomen will open the 1989 campaign at home against the University of Hawaii Friday, and St. Bonaventure on Saturday.

"The Hawaii match," said head coach Mike Husted, "will be very tough and we look at it as a good experience builder for us. We have nothing to lose and everything to gain."

On the other hand, Husted hopes for a victory against St. Bonaventure. "We'd like to beat them, we're really gearing up for the match."

Although this year's team consists mainly of freshmen and sophomores, Husted isn't worried. "All I ask," he said, "is that my players show consistency and mental toughness throughout every match."

Christine Willise will play no. 1 singles with Maura Foley playing no. 2. The rest of the lineup includes this week's practices's hot player Gail Giresella (-3) and Kerry Eddy (-4). The doubles team to watch will be Vanessa Kirchner and Shizuko Yamaski.

Friday's match begins at 2:30 p.m. and Saturday's at 1:00 p.m.; both will be played on the Boyden Courts.

Minutemen set themselves for Rainbows

The University of Massachusetts mens tennis team, weather permitting, will serve up its spring season with the first of 10 regular season matches today against the University of Hawaii.

The team is also scheduled to play in the Atlantic 10 Championships at Rutgers University April 21-22, and the New Englands at Connecticut April 29-30.

Last fall the Minutemen were 6-2, gaining wins over University of New Hampshire, Central Connecticut University, University of Connecticut, University of Hartford, Clark University and Westfield State University. Todays match starts at 2:30 at the Boyden courts. The team faces St. Bonaventure at 1:00 tomorrow.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are the pompous conjecture of the clueless slobs who have hung around this dump long enough to have some say in things.

Satanic, sexist popcorn

If you knew that a particular brand of snack food contributed to the oppression of women, would you buy it? Of course not.

What if you also discovered that this same snack food had militaristic, racist and satanic leanings? Would you stop packing it in your children's lunch boxes? You would indeed.

To the unconscious consumer, Cracker Jack seems like a genderless dessert. But an analysis of the caramel-coated treat exposes underlying favoritism. While 75 percent of all Cracker Jacks are consumed by women, 67 percent of the prizes are male-oriented. Not a single plastic trinket or glossy decal deals with women's herstory.

Karen Garlick

It comes as no shock that the product's logo is a White Anglo-Saxon Protestant male dressed in a sailor suit. A corresponding female role model is non-existent. The company could have created Jill the attorney. But they didn't. Despite the fact that there is a woman on the Supreme Court.

Behind Cracker Jack's campaign of male oppression is the U.S. Defense Department. Pentagon propaganda has now infiltrated boxed popcorn. Have they no shame? The Navy dupes the public with the playful image of a boy and his dog. Conveniently ignored is that these sex-starved sailor boys exploit women at every seaport. And their best friends are not puppy dogs, but F-14 fighter jets.

But the sexist military-industrial complex is not the only culprit. Satan has dug his greedy claws into the snack bowl as well. The nutritional information on the side of the Cracker Jack box lists the serving size as two-thirds of a cup. Convert that fraction to decimal form for Satan's signature: .666.

Tooth decay is not the devil's primary motive. If you subject the ingredients list to the scrutiny of an electron microscope, a secret message will be uncovered: Down with the Equal Rights Amendment.

Female-bashing carbohydrates cannot be tolerated. Unless sweeping reforms are made, chauvinistic Cracker Jack must be pulled from the shelves. If the following changes are not enacted within a 30-day grace period, my only logical recourse is to detonate the explosive device I have planted at Cracker Jack headquarters:

- Word Choice - I demand compensation for the testosteronic vocabulary printed on Cracker Jack boxes. POPcorn will become MOMcorn and the product's name will be changed to "Caramel Jill."
- Trademark - Replace the Navy poster child with the Swiss Miss Cocoa girl. Do not worry about copyright infringement, I shall take care of everything. Switzerland's military neutrality represents women's best interests.
- New Peanuts - Introduce estrogen-coated peanuts into the snack mix to bring men up to our biological level. They won't suspect a thing.

I am a sane rational person. I really am. If Cracker Jack executives do what I say, their pitiful lives will be spared. I've had enough with educational leaflets and seminars about women's issues. Men just ignore them. But now they'll listen. Every single demented one of them.

Bush tries to trash the White House

President Bush has signed a secret agreement with the Washington Incredibly Manly Painter's Union (WIMP) to prevent a massive painter's strike.

Howard T. Stud, president and founder of WIMP, presented Bush with a list of demands that had to be met by midnight March 30th, or painters across the country would go on strike, leaving this country's buildings and houses half painted, and looking pretty stupid too.

Merrydeath O'Dyin

Included in the list of Stud's demands were: 1/The government must enact legislation which forces paint companies to reimburse painters for the paint stains on shirts that have to be thrown away. 2/The EPA must come up with a new "peanutbutter" scent for paint. (To reduce irritation to painters' eyes and lessen headache tension.) 3/The dumb looking happy face symbols that appear on key chains, t-shirts, bumperstickers and notepads must be outlawed.

And the most bizarre demand was the fourth and final one. "Lastly, we demand that the White House be painted with pink and blue polka dots with a large happy face emblem on the front door with a big, black 'X' over it."

I am appalled! The White House, a symbol of our government, desecrated by some garish and demented painters! And what makes matters worse, Bush agreed to it.

Yesterday, some shocking information was disclosed by White House aides. Apparently, secret memos were uncovered, disclosing incredible proof that Bush's signing of the WIMP agreement may have been an undercover CIA operation beginning in 1987.

A memo from then, Vice-president Bush to Ronald Reagan read, "I'm sorry Ron, but I don't think that little horses would look good painted on the [White] House. But I agree with you, we need some color to spice up the joint."

The corresponding memo from Reagan to Bush read, "Sorry you don't think cowboys would look good. Well . . . I guess I'll leave it up to you Georgie. Hey, why don't I get my cousin Howard T. Stud to form a union in your honor that will be secretly run by you! That way you can chose the colors for the White House."

A memo dating December 1, 1988 from Vice-president elect Dan Quayle to George Bush was found stuck to the bottom of a trash can in the CIA archives. It read, "Hey George, I have a great idea for the White House! Why don't we paint it green and put little figures of me shooting a hole-in-one? After all, I did beat you playing golf."

Can you believe that we live in what is known as a country with some class?

When this country elected George Bush as president, we didn't elect Barbara Bush's home decorator — who, by some strange coincidence, is the sister of Nancy Reagan's astrologer!

Don't we, the citizens, get any say in the matter?

I, for one, would feel humiliated if the White House were painted with pink and blue polka dots! Can you image the foreign emissaries visiting the "Polka House"? Not only would they be confused, thinking that they were in Poland or something, but they'd take one look at it and keil over with dizziness.

You know, I also believe that the White House is just too bland and should be jazzed up a bit. It has been over 200 years with the same, old pasty white color. But, let's be serious — POLKA DOTS? How about a nice bright red to symbolize the strength and power of the United States. Better yet, how about a simple mauve with pink flamingos on the White House lawn? It could symbolize a kinder and gentler nation. And besides, it would go well with Bush's complexion.

I think that the White House should be done with some taste, and not conspiracies that are run by manical old men.

Beware! I'll be back to haunt you

There's a political theory circulating among Christians that says fringe group activists are repudiated by their own generation, but because so much attention is focused on the radicals, the next generation tolerates their views and shifts politically toward that position. Well, it's worked for the godless left-wingers, so I've made it my life's objective to reverse the tide by the same strategy. I call it, "leadership by making a spectacle of yourself for future generations".

Dusty Ranting

That's right, folks, your children will grow up thinking like me — upright, right-thinking, sold-out, born-again Christians. Just think, in 30 or 40 years you'll get letters home telling you to repent. It will be like reading the Tuesday Collegian all over again, except that by then abortion will be illegal and homosexuals will be dead of AIDS, and some other issue will be hot.

Of course, I have my immediate satisfactions, as well. Unbeknownst to the general public, I've been working on a BDIC degree from UMass in "The Philosophy of Redactive Evangelism and Creative Heterodoxy" (PREACH, for short). Half of the credits came from my weekly essays in the Collegian during the last ten semesters. It's a unique degree. I've already gotten scholarship offers from a couple of fundamentalist seminaries, and Accuracy In the Media wants to syndicate me for nationwide speaking engagements on college campuses. The only thing between me and my public speaking career now is an E-core; they keep flunking me in the evolution course.

Sad as it may seem, the major lesson my studies have taught me is that it doesn't really matter how reasonable your cause is. What matters is that you offend as many people as possible while talking about it. No, really, it's true.

Suppose, for instance, that you are a rabid nudist. You will not win big by pointing out that in nature, animals are nude, and that people don't need clothes because they spend most of their time inside away from the elements, anyway. You will win big by getting 50 fellow nudists to join you in the buff at Jesse Helm's headquarters. You will win big with the media — and ultimately bring more nudists to your cause — by having two hundred attractive people simultaneously strip in front of the local clothing store to protest commercial oppression of nudists by garment retailers.

Now this generation would reject that kind of exhibitionism. But the kids — many would become experimental nudists after five or ten years of exposure to such displays, and who knows? Twenty years after that even legislatures might come together in the altogether. Abortion, f?nism, homosexuality, a truce in VietNam; they all became the status quo after offensive protests.

I probably shouldn't have used that example; the closet nudists on campus may get some ideas. In fact, maybe I shouldn't have told you about "leadership by making a spectacle of yourself" at all. You'll probably all take it to the nth degree and some heathen blowhard will accuse me of a "get obnoxious for Jesus" campaign.

It doesn't matter in the long run. Because in 30 years or so, I'll be back to haunt you. You will have just opened an envelope from State U. with your child's scrawl on it, and the deja vu will begin . . .

Dusty Ranting is a Collegian columnist and has just been awarded an honorary bachelor's degree and one-way ticket to Omaha by a unanimous vote of the faculty senate

I am sik and tyred of theese stoopid colledge students who can't rite or spell good. Its so terrable, these studints can't even rite a clear sentance so that other decint humen beans can understand it properly or anything.

When you go to skol, you shud no how to do these things because if you rite run-on sentincas, uncleer transishuns, or have bad spelling and grammar, well how do you expect anyone to luk at you're resumay with a strait face? How do theese pepule think their going to get a job if they cant even spell or use good gramma?

this is an udder disgrace, and I for won am appaled by the lack of consern ofer the sad shape of America's edukashunal sistim.

Amherst tomato terrors

Get this.

I ate a tomato, whole, just yesterday with my girlfriend in downtown Amherst.

It was my first time. I was scared. Petrified.

But she gave me a sedative, right there in the Pizza Pub, and I ate it. In about five bites.

And I'm still here to write about it.

David Ardvark

Then we tried to think of something else to do. Topping a tomato feast is difficult, you know. Rollercoaster rides are out. So are big keg parties at UMass. I would like to have heard the marching band, but football season is over.

So we went to a movie.

Not a great movie, but a movie nonetheless. I looked at my girlfriend, and as the film began, I could see her face light up with enjoyment.

It must have been in amazement of the individual frames creating an optical illusion that many of us refer to today as a "motion picture."

Hmmn.

I just realized that today is April 1. I just noticed Passover's just around the corner. Then it'll be Hanukkah again.

What if I can't buy Matzoh in the Happy Valley? Makes you wonder if time is going by too fast, or if I've written one too many economics papers.

I wish I had my Dapper Dan doll still. When I was younger, I'd sit in front of the television with my sister, watch Grover, Kermit and Mr. Snuffleupagus on Sesame Street and build Lincoln Log castles with my Dapper Dan. Those were the days. . . Now I'm 21, about to embark on a journalism career and learning to eat fresh vegetables. Makes one wish for a simpler life of comic books and Twinkies.

If I had to map out my life, there'd be a fork in the road. But one thing for sure: there'd be a tomato garden.

More 8-track faves for the velour-minded music lover

Just when you thought the cause was dead, more of those precious relics of the wide-collar era have turned up under the back seat of my '72 Dart.

As any serious music fan knows, Kiss Alive 2 is one of those unforgettable pieces of live memorabilia. Forget the slick, pink-skinned pansies on MTV; Gene, Peter, Ace and Paul were Kiss. There's just no substitute for the feeling that comes from making oneself up like the Star-Child and biting a few blood capsules.

When Grand Illusion was first released, Styx was still an underground movement. These street-hardened virtuosos knew what rock and roll hardball is all about. "Come Sail Away" has become an anthem for those of us who choose the alternate lifestyle, if you know what I mean. Don't be afraid of this one, beneath the rough-hewn surface, you're bound to find that the lyrical prowess of this band suits your lifestyle.

Remember when UHF stations ruled the afterschool scene and it was all you could do to keep yourself from sending $7.95 to K-Tel for the latest, hippest compilation of Rick Dees and Nervous Norvus hits. Disco Express is fundamental to any dashboard and should be played at least once a week. How could you possibly go without gems like Peaches and Herb's "Roller Skatin' Date" and "I Will Survive" from Gloria Gaynor. Let's face it, this was the good stuff.

Get The Knack, for the most part, defined American music during the key transitional period between the disco and new-wave eras. "My Sharona" and "Good Girls Don't (But I Do)" took the world by storm, and even former president Jimmy Carter couldn't resist the infectious beat layed down by these ultra-slick pop mavens.

"Cyrus (Vance) turned me on to The Knack. I used to crank that tape in Rosalyn's Cordoba, while I was tooling around Pennsylvania Avenue. Cyrus could really roll ... but those boys could rock," said Carter in a 1981 Hustler Magazine interview.

Next week, we'll explore the current Air Supply-Men At Work revival phenomenon: the cutting edge of Aussie rock!

"Special Friend" to the Collegian

A day and a half after Dustin Hoffman won the "Best Actor" Oscar for his stellar performance in Rainman, the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences has reneged on its awarding of the coveted statuette.

Claiming an error was made in the judging process, Academy spokesman Tobe Hooper (Texas Chainsaw Massacre) declared that the award must be returned by Hoffman, so that a judges re-evaluation may be made in the controversial category.

"It was just a plain screw-up," Hooper said.

"Best Actor was supposed to have gone to Dusty Rhodes."

Rhodes, also known as "The American Dream", is a retired professional wrestler. Fans may recall his violent WWF battles with Fritz Von Ehrich and King Kong Mosca. The 400 pound bleach blond brawler starred in the 1988 film Kickin' Ass For Jesus, a moving tale of life on the road for a limb-snapping bounty hunter who doubles as a Baptist minister.

"It was just a mix-up with the names," Hooper added, "Dustin, Dusty . . . you know, no big deal."

Contacted at his Revere beach summer cottage, Rhodes showed little emotion in response to the honor.

"Yeah it's nice to win it I guess, I saw that Raindance thing on a plane I think. It was pretty good, no tits though," he said.

Hoffman refused comment when asked if he felt betrayed by the Academy's actions. Rainman co-star Tom Cruise, however, had this to say.

"I don't really view myself as a sex object. If women find me attractive, that's fine, but accept me for what I am . . . a serious actor."

The Academy will hold meetings this weekend to finalize the decision to award the Oscar to Rhodes.

Rainman director Barry Levinson was unable to comment on the issue due to an agreement with the Academy, however, he was able to perform complex arithmetic problems and simple algebra.

Cruise, whose failure with Cocktail apparently motivated his solid Rainman performance, made a final note on the situation, "I don't really view myself as a sex object. If women find me attractive, that's fine, but accept me for what I am . . . a serious actor."

Thrifty milk users fear anal intrusion

By JASON TALERMAN
Collegian Dealer

Hey kids! I got a question for ya. When you woke up this morning to the sound of your favorite Steve Windbag song and staggered down to the D.C., how seriously did you think about your breakfast cereal. Usually I'm not in much of a condition to think about anything much after yet another night hanging out with a bunch of skinny, anemic Hampshire College kids who know as much about Marshall power as Georgetown do about hoops (spaghetti and otherwise). But from a purely objective standpoint, such as the one I will adopt on NCCA finals day, I would say, if I can modify the old adage, that you are what you eat first thing in the morning.

Now psycho-analysis has never been a particular strong point of mine; The only piece of free association that's ever struck me as being of profound importance is "Pabst" and "good times," but when both of those run out, and your only source of alcoholic enlightenment is evaporated bootpolish, you get to thinking about things like what your preferred proportion of milk to cereal says about your level of psychoticism, and having been recently forced to endure such spartan squalor, I've been thinking about this a lot and I believe I've come up with some ideas that may challenge Hans Eysenck, the Wayne Coyne of studies in abnormal personality.

My theory is this; if you're the type who normally floods your bowl, then you're extrovert, but you've probably got a highly diluted personality. There's an interesting equation here: the deeper the milk the shallower the person. I suspect the girl from Gidget Goes to the Mall falls into this category, though in her case the cause is probably more a result of the effect.

The other side of the Coyne is that if you like it dry and crunchy, then you're most likely repressed, because the way I figure it, milk retention ¹ anal retention. You were probably the kind of kid who collected matchboxes for a hobby, but don't worry cause it also means that you're deeply misunderstood and "into tension." The point is that I have once again duped you into reading a meaningless pile of self-indulgent bilge that took me about the time for the average crap to write.

Pez: The scandal rocks UMass

By J. NARC
Collegian Snoop

It had to happen sometime. In today's world of collegiate athletics, it has become increasingly harder to resist the temptation of going to outside sources for energy.

But little could it be known that such a widespread problem would first be discovered here at the University of Massachusetts. The Collegian, through some finagling [and a little bribery], has unearthed possibly the biggest scandal of all-time — rampant Pez usage among UMass athletes.

For those of you unfamiliar with the substance, Pez is a small sugary candy which is dispensed from the head of a silly plastic character, such as a cartoon character or superhero. The candy was thought to be out of existence for some time, but users have been able to obtain it through various channels.

Pez paraphernalia, confiscated by the Collegian, and you'd better not say anything about it to anyone. Or else.

Investigators at the Food, Drug, Sex and Other Naughty Things Administration suspected illegal activity within the realm of UMass sports. But nothing was concrete until someone finally decided to clean the locker room at Boyden Gym.

"I was sifting through the lockers, ya know, pickin' up soiled jocks and stuff, when all of a sudden I come across this bag," a janitor, who wished to remain anonymous for obvious reasons, said. "It's got these colored pellets in it. I didn't know what it was, so I popped one in my mouth, and boy, what a rush. Those things were great."

Anyway, the janitor decided to contact the authorities, who upon testing confirmed that the bag contained a large quantity of Pez with a street value of approximately $5.24.

This finding prompted further inquiries, which revealed that nearly every UMass athlete at one time had popped Pez.

"I just couldn't resist it," said baseball pitcher Steve Stiffneck, who admitted to pitching a one-hitter last year after eating 16 packages of Pez in the dugout during warm-ups. "When I saw that Goofy guy from Walt Disney on top, it reminded me of that cartoon where he was pitching. I just had to have it. The stuff made me feel so much better."

Stiffneck also admitted to carrying the illegal substance with him on the mound, along with a tube of Vaseline, sandpaper, a rasp, chisel, power drill and Stanley work bench. "I never got caught, though."

Lacrosse player Chris Zucchini took precautionary measures to prevent from getting caught.

"Everyone thought I had asthma," Zucchini boasts, "but I really had a Pez dispenser disguised as a thing of Primatine mist. Worked great. Got it in New York City — reeeeal cheap, too."

Although no punishments have been handed down as of yet, it is unknown just what this scandal will do to the future of UMass athletics.

The dangers of Pez use

Once thought to be a harmless child's candy, Pez has become a severe performance-altering drug, a doctor warns.

"It was fine when little kids chowed those things down," says Dr. Quincy Quack of the University Health Services. "They'd go out in the yard, get all wound up and bang their heads against trees. You could get the same effect from eating just the marshmallow part of Lucky Charms.

"But then athletes caught onto it, and they'd get carried away, downing whole packages at once. They'd go into a hyper state and God knows what might happen."

Dr. Quack also warns that the notorious hydrogenized palm oil, one of the ingredients of Pez, will cause a urine sample to test positive for drugs.

Budget cuts change plans for new arena

By SAM BULLSHTEIN
Collegian Hick

The State's budget cutting ax may fall on the proposed $10 million "Mullins Convocation Center," scheduled to be built sometime after cows housed in the barn on the arena's future site come home.

Chancellor Duefee's announcement yesterday that the legislature was considering witholding $9.7 million — or roughly 34 percent — of the original funds sent architects and athletic directors alike scrambling in search of corners to cut.

"We're still committed to building a first-rate athletic facility that will house our basketball program and be the foundation atop which our hockey enterprise is poured," said UMass Athletic Director Frank McInomoney. "It's just going to be a kinda sucky one, that's all."

McInomoney presented a list of money saving measures to the building's architectural planners yesterday, and his suggestions wander from the original plans dramatically.

Changes would include changing the name of the building to "Eggs' place" and using the hockey ice surface for basketball games; both measures are aimed at reducing paint costs.

The digital scoreboard that was to be installed over center court would be scrapped, replaced by a slightly modified Peter Pan Bus arrivals and departures board. "Sorry about that," said McInomoney.

"We're still committed, however, to providing state of the art game information reference services.

"And the locker rooms are gonna have to go too, though I feel it's important to say that we're committed to a nationally competitive player hospitality environment," continued the harried AD. "We'll just ask the crowd to politely face the other way while the players change and stuff. We're all friends here."

Duefee said that ticket prices would be hiked to $212 per event to help offset the losses. Students and University employees would still be admitted for free with proper ID he said, though "if that basketball team ever gets good and the kids actually start coming to the games, we may have to rethink things a bit."

Players, coaches and fans reacted to the announcement with dismay and outrage, and began to plan lobbying efforts aimed at making their opinions heard on Beacon Hill.

"If this thing goes through," fumed head basketball coach John Calamari, "we're considering a job action. People will know when it's happening — I'll have my guys hit all their outside shots and play decent defense until our we get our way!"

Calamari's 27 assistant coaches nodded in agreement. "We agree," they said. "And we don't give a crap that Talerman's got three of the final four."

Amherst Representative Stan Rosencrantz said plans are underway to launch a massive letter-writing campaign aimed at persuading the legislature to change its mind. "If someone would just write one letter on behalf of each athlete, we could make a difference," he said.

"And if that doesn't work, we'll just send the guys out there to kick the shit out of George Kevarian. He's a puke."

Oh, no! Here's another stupid Collegian contest

In our, The Coll-dweebian, never-ending effort to play games rather than cover them we have decided to hold another contest — our first-ever Joe Duffey Final Four contest.

The object of the contest is simple: pick the final four fraternities which will remain at the University (Chancellor Daffey has promised cooperation by throwing some more frats out within the next few weeks). Of course the person with the most correct choices and who has also picked The Last Remaining Fraternity at UMass wins.

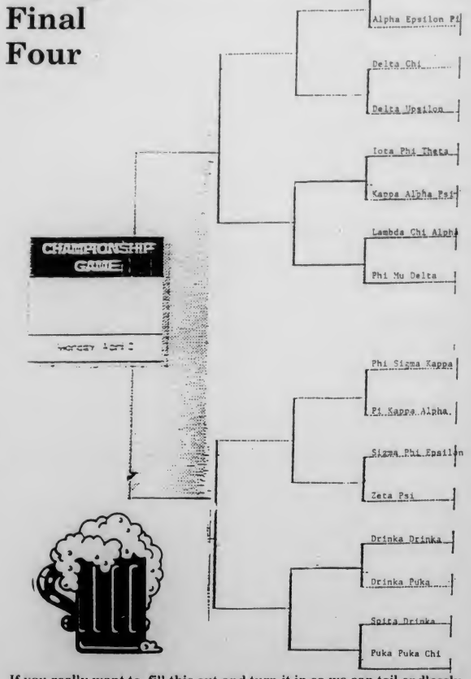
Daffey promised the contest will be full of surprises and underdog winners. He has handicapped the contest by, not only making beer drinking an expulsionable offense but by tossing any of the Greeks if members are caught wearing sweats, talking in any incomplete sentences, or belching in public (we expect the contest to last two days).

The scoring system is one point for the first round, two for the second, five for the third, and 10 for the fifth — picking the winner is worth 25 points.

Let's see did we forget anything . . .? Oh yeah, the prizes!

The winner will get a free dinner at teetotaling Joe's house/mansion guaranteed to be filled with conversation/lecture about morality.

Duffey's Final Four



If you really want to, fill this out and turn it in so we can toil endlessly over these instead of providing you with meaningful stories.

600 students oppose booze price hike

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

A petition signed last week by some 600 University of Massachusetts students protesting a suggested increase in liquor license fees will be presented to the Amherst Select Board tonight, before a vote on the controversial increase occurs, according to an opponent of the increase.

Chick Delano, owner of Delano's in Amherst, said the students did not have to be registered voters, "just concerned about the issue."

"Almost everyone knew about the issue," he said. "Most were outraged; they thought the proposed increases were ridiculous."

The petition will be presented by representatives of the Amherst Hospitality Association, formerly the Committee for the Sale and Distribution of Alcoholic Beverages in the Town of Amherst.

"We told the students who weren't familiar with the issue what the increases were, and how they would affect the menu prices; food and drink prices would have to be raised," Delano said. The increase would affect two types of establishments in Amherst — raising the price of a liquor license for an all alcohol restaurant from $2,500 to $5,000 and for a wine and malt restaurant from $600 to $5,000.

Some UMass students said if the price of alcohol in Amherst is raised substantially, they would consider taking their business to Northampton.

"I would go to Northampton more often because I think the price increases would be much too high," said Elizabeth Fotinos, a senior sociology major. "It would be worth travelling the extra ten minutes. Besides, it's much less crowded in Northampton."

She said alcohol was was used as a way to increase revenue for the town because "students will always go to bars, and if they want to make money, they'll go after alcohol."

"I'll probably frequent Northampton more often," Erik Scott, a junior communications major said.

Brad Gore, manager of Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton, said he thinks bars and restaurants in Northampton will benefit from the increases.

Chris Boulger, a UMass junior, said he hopes to see the increases pass. "I'd like to see more people go to Northampton to clear out Amherst, this way, I won't have to feel like a sardine in Barsies."

"Students are not full-time residents of Amherst, and if the town wants the increase, they should have it," he said.

Reforms may trim SGA

Speaker hopes to remove do nothing senators from rolls

By MARIA SACHETTI
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate risks losing one third of its members today in the first of a series of reforms designed to make the senate more efficient, said Senate Speaker John Dunlap.

Dunlap, who was sworn in last week, said he will carry out his "threat" to drop 26 senators from the roll if they fail to submit applications for a senate committee or University-wide committee by noon today.

Every senator is required to join a committee, but Dunlap said many senators have been inactive since October, thereby failing to correctly serve their constituents.

"These are people who never did anything," he said. "Technically, I could've walked into office and dropped every single one of these people."

Several people who risk being dropped from the roll have been senators for several years, citing Bob McDevitt and Brian Darling.

McDevitt said last Wednesday that he serves on the Chancellor's Committee on Alcohol, but Dunlap said that committee has been defunct for some time.

Dunlap said the senate, which is notorious for its filibusters and general inefficiency during the past year, is stalled not by those who have a certain political affiliation, but by the "Wednesday night" senators, who attend weekly meetings but avoid the committee work involved

"It's the senators who walk in on Wednesday night and walk out and play no role in the government for the rest of the week," he said.

The weekly senate meetings are held to approve and evaluate committee work and proposals completed during the week, but Dunlap said the lack of senator participation in committee meetings has distorted the purpose of the SGA.

"I think that's why people don't feel like we do anything," he said. "But, if they came and sat in on an academic affairs meeting, they'd have a very different view of what student government is about."

Metallica makes the big leagues

By PAULA HOGAN
Collegian Correspondent

The special day finally arrived - after three long months of planning and waiting. The show had been sold-out since January, and those not fortunate enough to possess a credit card, or any other viable means of obtaining concert tickets, were left with the dreaded task of dealing with the merciless scalpers.

Lines were endlessly long, and the cold Massachusetts air was attacking as everyone trudged through the tiny opening.

Once inside, energy levels of unsurpassable amounts permeated the smoky air. All attention was immediately drawn to the colossal stage which had been effectively hidden by a large black curtain. This was it. Within moments the band would take the stage and life as we know it would change for the next two hours. This was no ordinary musical ensemble. It was one that had come from being an underground phenomenon to a world-wide double-platinum recording act. It was a band whom many claim as a major influence on their own musical endeavors, and the one responsible for pioneering the rigid backbone of today's speed/thrash metal outfits. It was Metallica.

With 100 some odd shows under their belts, Metallica's Damaged Justice tour is one concert event that is capturing mega-attention. Selling out shows across the country, their first headlining performance is proving to all that Metallica are a band who are finally attaining the commercial success they deserve.

History professor dies at 68

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts history professor Dean Albertson died of lung cancer in his Longmeadow home Friday. He was 68.

According to history professors and teaching assistants, Albertson gained a large following on campus because he presented a unique view of American history, but did not try to force his views on students.

"He was a very popular teacher, he had a very large following on this campus," said History Department Chairman Roland Sarti. "His approach was that he wanted to challenge the students."

Sarti said Albertson also played a major role on campus in the 1960's when he took part in protests against the Vietnam War.

Man accused of embezzlement to raise money for baseball cards

DEDHAM (AP) – A Marshfield accountant faces larceny and forgery charges after he allegedly embezzled $88,000 from a Randolph company to fund his valuable baseball card collection.

Investigators say Richard E. Bernard, 46, allegedly used a company credit card from New England Card Index, Co. to order cartons of unopened cards from distributors in Texas, California and New York, along with such prized items as a Mickey Mantle card worth more than $1,000, the Boston Sunday Globe reported.

Investigators from the white-collar crime unit of the Norfolk County district attorney's office say Bernard also laundered money through the employee bank account that financed the office Christmas party.

A Norfolk County grand jury has indicted Bernard on two counts each of forgery and larceny, the newspaper reported. He is scheduled to be arraigned this week in Norfolk County Superior Court.

Bernard said the charges stemmed from "a misunderstanding" between the company and himself and said he was unaware of the indictments. He said he would plead not guilty in court.

"It's a multifaceted problem," Bernard said. "It's not just cut and dried, that Dick Bernard took X-amount of dollars...I have been cooperating with everybody. There's more than one party involved. It's not just me and New England Card."

New England Card has filed a civil suit seeking to recover the allegedly stolen money. According to court papers, Bernard has repaid the company $7,204.

According to investigators, Bernard set up his own company – New England Card and I – to purchase and sell baseball cards.

According to court papers, when the company discovered the alleged embezzlement last July, Bernard was fired and he agreed to pay back the money.

Since Janurary, the card collection has been held in a Quincy warehouse while Edward Masterson, a Quincy attorney appointed to keep the collection, has fielded various inquiries about it.

Fitness buff assails fatty fast foods

By DARREN GARNICK
Collegian Staff

Fitness icon Richard Simmons performed an "exercise concert" at the Hampshire Mall Saturday, pleading with his followers to avoid fatty foods whenever possible.

"Put down that hotdog," he screamed over the public address system before parading through the fast food strip. Hurdling the Arthur Treacher's countertop, Simmons playfully scolded restaurant employees for preparing fried food. On his way to the Cafe Square Stage, he pranced from table to table confiscating ice cream cones.

"How many people need to lose weight?" Simmons asked an estimated crowd of 200 well-wishers. When the majority raised their hands, he sighed, "Dear God, let us pray."

This year there are more overweight children and teenagers than ever before, he said, urging parents against letting their children "sit home all day long and watch TV."

In an effort to encourage activity, Simmons invited a dozen youngsters on stage to join him in a Romper Room-style dance session.

Infuriated at the sight of snacking onlookers, Simmons started an impromptu aerobics class in the sedentary dining area. One unmotivated muncher, 13 year-old Heidi Mantler from Easthampton, defended her fried dough purchase, topped with confectionary sugar, explaining she exercises three days a week at dance class.

"We all know that fat does kill," Simmons said, "If you can't get motivated now, you might as well have a nice meal, find the nearest bridge, and jump."

Simmons, who tipped the scales at 268 pounds in high school, urged those in the audience who needed to lose 30 or more pounds to join him in his war on obesity. "If I can do it, anyone can," he cried.

Dancing with the 30-plus group to the soundtracks of Fame ("I want to live forever") and Saturday Night Fever ("Stayin' Alive"), Simmons addressed some snickering in the audience.

"You can never judge anyone by what it says on the scale," he said. "It takes guts to come up here, and they need our support. They don't need us pointing fingers and being nasty."

Simmons emphasized that exercise needs to be complemented with good dietary habits. "Face the facts, if you eat fried foods, mayonaisse, oil and ice cream in large quantities . . . you will always have a weight problem." he said. "But more important than any of that is to like yourself as you are now."

Jessie Korrell, 67, from Springfield said that Richard Simmons' exercise videos boost her self-esteem. "He doesn't humiliate you," she said.

Simmons' cheerleader enthusiasm carried over to the autograph/photo session following his show. He took time to chat, discuss weight-loss goals, and playfully tease his fans. Because of the conversational nature of the session, lines moved slowly.

Ginny Sinkoski, 40, from Belchertown, said Simmons was "very genuine" and added that it was worth the long wait to see him. "He's like a messiah for the world of dieters," she explained.

Other autograph hounds were not as patient. Karen Harris, a junior psychology major from the University of Massachusetts moaned, "I feel like I'm waiting in line to get into a bar or something."

Greeks discuss meaning of pledging

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

The purpose of pledging is to learn about the history and tradition of a particular fraternity or sorority, not to be humiliated, according to a member of the Greek Affairs department speaking yesterday at the second annual Pledge Education Day.

The session, which opens the Greek Area's annual Greek Week, began with speeches from several members of the Inter Fraternity Council and Greek Affairs staff, including assistant Greek Affairs director Debra Valkenaar, who explained how her department worked for the fraternities and sororities.

Later, on a more serious note, she discussed the hazing problem on the national level, citing an incident in which members of a fraternity at Cornell University tied their pledges, nude, and forced them to walk back to their house.

She also mentioned a case in which a fraternity pledge at Rutgers University died after being forced to consume a large amount of alcohol. "His blood alcohol count was .44. [A person with a count of] .10 is considered legally intoxicated," Valkenaar said.

Valkenaar said that hazing has also affected the image of the Greek area, saying that many potential members have been scared away from the system.

She advised pledges that suspect that they are being hazed to "stick together – nobody wants to lose an entire pledge class."

Turning her attention to pledge educators and other active fraternity and sorority members, she emphasized the need for respect for the pledges to keep them in the Greek system.

"They trust you," she said. "Don't betray their trust by making them do things that make them [feel] uncomfortable."

Amy Williams, a pledge at Alpha Chi Omega sorority, said the discussion, which also included a role-playing session with some pledges and pledge educators, was interesting.

"It's nice to hear about rules about hazing. In universities in the South, hazing is [very common]," she said. She mentioned that a friend, who was pledging at a sorority in a North Carolina college, had been hazed.

Officials of the governing bodies of the Greek Area, the Interfraternity and Panhellenic councils, said they were impressed by the high number of pledges who attended. Deborah Broder, secretary of the Panhellenic Council, said the event "promotes a lot of unity in the Greek Area." Recent external problems have made internal unity especially emphasized, she added, saying, "[It's a] hard enough battle with the [town of] Amherst and the University – why battle each other?"

The town has a history of trying to prohibit Greek Area growth and the University has revoked charters of three fraternities since March of 1988.

Milind Bharvirkar, Interfraternity Council president, agreed that the high turnout reflects Greek Area unity. He said the series of programs held served in leadership training. "These [the pledges] are the future leaders of the Greek Area," he said.

Computer learning facility opens after long wait

By SIMONE NICHOLSON
Collegian Correspondent

It took five years of planning, but the Benjamin Banneker Microcomputer Learning Facility finally opened Friday, with a grand opening reception at the center's New Africa House location.

"I have been hearing about this computer center opening up ever since my freshman year," said University of Massachusetts junior Devita Gross, a political science major. "I was beginning to think it was never going to happen."

The center includes a color monitor, four dot matrix printers, two laser printers, and 16 MacIntosh terminals, 12 with dual floppy disk drives and four with access to graphics software and font libraries. The technology enables the center to be "an interactive, multimedia research center in Afro-American, Afro-Caribbean and African Studies," said Ernest Allen, the center's director.

A special feature of the center, according to Allen, is a 16-level digital scanner that will be used to continuously feed resources, such as syllabi, into the computer for student use.

But for all its innovative technology, the center is also a part of history, he said.

Banneker, for whom the center is named, was a black farmer in 18th century Maryland who established himself as an astronomer, mathematician, almanac publisher and surveyor.

A printer on the south wall of the center is named the "Freedom's Journal," which was the first black-owned newspaper in the nation. The actual individual terminals represent stations of the underground railroad, Allen said.

"No student will be able to enter without a little bit of their history rubbing off," he said.

The center, though not yet fully operational, will for now be open to students in Afro-American Studies and CCEBMS, Allen said. Once totally functional, the facility will be open to the larger University community, he said.

Local woman helps children of alcoholics

By MANOS STEFANAKOS
Collegian Correspondent

Women reared by alcoholic parents have special problems, and a Northampton woman is dedicated to helping them overcome these problems.

Gail Letendre, a counselor at Adult Daughters of Alcoholic Parents, said her weekly therapy sessions are "a second step in the ongoing process of healing."

Adult children of alcoholics face problems, Letendre said, because their childhood was a time of confusion and a "mixed mess full of empty promises."

Children of alcoholics "look at television and movies and books for an idea of what a normal family is," she says, and "this causes misconceptions about relationships."

According to Letendre, children of alcoholics grow up with three rules: "don't talk; don't trust; don't feel." The purpose of her group is to try and get these women to share their experiences, so they realize everyone is not lying to them, she said. The pain of being told, "I love you," and then hurt by the same person, or abused, makes them build a wall around themselves.

To break down that wall, Letendre takes six to seven women into a six-month program with the goal of teaching them to overcome their fears and misconceptions.

She works with all female groups because she said she thinks this provides "a safe and supportive" environment for the women so they talk more openly about their past.

Letendre says her group is fundamentally different from self-help groups like AlAnon because she requires a commitment of six months, and the women must share their thought with others. In many self-help groups the sharing is optional.

People in her group must apply for admittance because "this is not a beginner group," she says, and for people to be accepted they have to have already gone through some individual therapy.

Letendre, who has a master's degree in education, started counseling about 10 years ago. Initially she counseled single women and couples; for the past five years she has been counseling children of alcoholics.

She said she chose this field because of the extent of the problem. There are about 10 million alcoholics in the United States and each of them "affects the lives of at least four-to-five people who are close to them."

Her group is part of the "four-to-five year continuous process of healing," but only provides one part of the healing.

England seminar still open

Application deadline for summer program extended

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts English Department is looking for 20 students for the upcoming Oxford summer seminar at Trinity College in England, said Richard Bump, administrative director of the program.

The reason the openings are being offered past the March 31 application deadline is because final figures on available dormitory space at Trinity were not available until very recently, Bump said.

A new application deadline has been set for April 20, he said.

The program, which attracts students from colleges all over the country, is an attempt to "simulate as closely as possible, for six weeks, the English experience" of learning and to give students the cultural and educational benefits Trinity has to offer, Bump said.

One of these benefits includes the use of the Bodleian Library at Trinity, which contains copies or originals of every work ever published in England since about the early 18th century, Bump said.

The UMass program is unique because students are taught by English professors the English way — small classes, weekly workshops and a lot of one-on-one contact — whereas other programs bring they're own faculty to teach in an English setting, Bump said.

"The workload is the same if not a little more than here. [But] it's very intense, it's a compacted six weeks," he said.

Students that go on the trip are at once exposed to the ancient and prestigious setting of Trinity, which is located at the heart of Oxford University, and the city of Oxford where plays and musical events are stagged all summer long, Bump said.

"Oxford itself is absolutely booming with music. It's music that ranges anywhere from classical to contemporary," Bump said. "It's a city that if one wants to, he can go out every night and hear live music."

On top of the nightly activity in and around Oxford, Bump said many day trips are planned so students can get out of the area and see some of England.

"We call them our mystery tours because we're never quite sure where we're going to go," he said.

Some of the trips already planned include a visit to Warwick Castle, where wax figures are set up around the castle depicting life in the middle ages, and a trip to Stratford on Avon, the home of William Shakespeare, Bump said.

Also, for about $200, students can take part in a weekend trip to either Paris or Cornwall in Devon on the southwestern coast of England, he said.

Many of the courses offered also use outside activities to help students learn.

The Shakespeare-in-Reperatory course for example will see five plays of which one will be Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice with Dustin Hoffman playing the lead role of Shylock, Bump said.

"I think that when all is said and done, although people thought of him as a radical, a leftist, and a Marxist, he was a very gentle and kind person, and he was upset when he saw that we were less than gentle and kind."

"That was the thing about him — he had a unique teaching style," said Daniel Costello, a TA in Albertson's Contemporary American History course. Costello said he had known of students who brought friends to hear him lecture.

"More than any other professor I've ever had, he had the best relationship with his students," Costello said.

Albertson's wife, Eve Spangler, a sociology professor at Boston College, said she was glad to talk about her husband because, among other things, "he was a very distinguished man."

Spangler said Albertson was diagnosed as having lung cancer two years ago, and had an operation a year ago to remove some of the cancer. He had also undergone chemotherapy and radiation treatments, which had little effect.

She said the only classes he missed before his death were on Monday and Wednesday of last week. "One of his only concerns in his last week were his students," she said.

Albertson was born Aug. 22, 1920 in Denver, Colorado. He later moved to Oakland, California, where he attended high school. He then attended the University of California at Berkeley, receiving a bachelor's degree in history in 1942.

He served in the US Navy as a fighter pilot in World War II from 1943 to 1945, and then returned to UCal-Berkeley to receive a master's degree in history in 1947. He received a doctorate in history from Columbia University in 1955, and also was one of the founders of the Columbia Oral History Project.

He began teaching at Brooklyn College in New York in 1959 and remained there until September, 1965, when came to UMass.

Albertson authored the books "Roosevelt's Farmer," "Eisenhower as President," and "Rebels or Revolutionaries: Student Movements of the 1960's." He was also co-author of "Main Problems in American History with UMass history professor Milton Cantor and former UMass professor Howard H. Quint. He was published in magazines and journals, and was the recipient of several research grants.

Albertson is survived by his wife Eve, 42, son Mark, 32, of San Jose, California, and daughter Constant, 28, who lives near Montreal. He also leaves a granddaughter, Sarah Eden.

A memorial service for Albertson is scheduled for 4 p.m. today at the First Church on the Green, Route 5 in Longmeadow.

meet with Botha, U.N. officials and British members of the U.N. monitoring force. Thatcher said a special session of the U.N. Security Council should be called to consider the alleged SWAPO incursion.

There was a tense 30-minute standoff outside the capital when some 100 policemen confronted as many as 20,000 SWAPO supporters marching to Windhoek from the Black township of Katatura, seeking to celebrate the start of the independence process.

About 400 SWAPO supporters reached downtown Windhoek and held a rally across from a luxury hotel. About 30 policemen watched but did not interfere as the crowd chanted "SWAPO, we win!"

Until November's popular election, when Black majority rule is scheduled to be restored in Namibia, administration of the territory as well as law enforcement will be held by Administor-General Louis Pienaar, appointed by South Africa. Out of Namibia's 1.3 million, about 70,000 are white.

SWAPO is favored in the pre-independence elections, but whether it can gain the two-thirds support needed to have complete control over the drafting of the constitution is uncertain.

ASK US

Question: Is it normal for a man, on occasion, not to be able to get an erection while being stimulated?

Answer: Yes. Physical and emotional factors may interfere. A man who is overtired or overstressed is not at his best at anything. Be understanding and patient.

Question: Is it possible to become aroused and/or have an orgasm while under the influence of alcohol?

Answer: Most drugs, including alcohol, numb sexual feelings and depress sexual function unless taken in very small amounts. Alcohol may loosen inhibitions or tensions to make intimacy more approachable, but at the same time may diminish physical awareness and make orgasm unlikely. Many a partygoer has been dismayed to find his performance impaired after an evening of heavy drinking.

Question: How important are simultaneous orgasms?

Answer: Not very. In fact "Separate turns" may be even more pleasureable, especially in a new relationship where you are getting to know each other. Most people find they are unable to fully experience their own sensations while trying to give pleasure to their partner.

Dunlap said Sen. Scott Kramer, chair of the rents and fees committee, and Sen. Jessica Mitchell, who serves on the budgets and academic affairs committee were examples of senators who are serving their constituents and lauded them for their hard work in recent months.

"These people are killing themselves with the amount of work they are doing," he said. "It's not glamorous and it doesn't get them a big name, but they're doing so much for students."

Dunlap urged students to become aware of their senators' actions to insure they are receiving adequate representation.

"It's the constituents' place to make sure the senator is doing their job," he said, adding that people who are not informed enough to make an educated vote should not serve in the senate.

"It's those people who are bringing down student government," Dunlap said.

Welcome to the real world

So far the quote of the year has come from the mayor of Washington D.C., Marion Barry: "Outside of the killings, (Washington D.C.) has one of the lowest crime rates in the country."

Bob Bobala

Thank you, Mr. Barry. I will no longer fear the idea of going to my nation's capital. If I decide to in the near future, I can visit historic Washington D.C., knowing that I probably will not be robbed or assaulted. The only thing I need to worry about is being killed.

Washington D.C. is no longer just our political capital, it is also the country's murder capital. Last year, there was a record 372 homicides in D.C. So far, this year, there has been 119 killings, almost all of them drug-related.

I can hear the new speeches that tour guides are preparing for foreign visitors now: Welcome. Welcome to our nation's capital. Come and see the monuments to the men who made this land great. See where our leaders work so hard trying to keep it great. . . . But dead-bolt yourself inside your hotel room after dark.

"Drugs are the problem, not Mayor Barry," says the Washington mayor.

Obviously, Mr. Barry, you are not the reason behind D.C.'s drug wars. One quick question though. In December, undercover policemen found you visiting the hotel room of drug suspect Charles Lewis. Since then there has been much speculation over whether or not you are a drug user. Doesn't this hurt your credibility in your role as a self-proclaimed "commander general" in the war on drugs?

"I should not be judged guilty by association."

Fair enough, mayor. This is not just your problem, anyway. To put away the dope dealers and clean up the drug battlegrounds, you need the help of another one of the city's prominent citizens – Mr. Bush. Which makes me wonder why the President went to Pennsylvania a few weeks ago to talk about drugs. Why didn't he just step out into his backyard where the real problem is?

Actually, I was there for a day last summer, and the tourist area of the city seems safe. As long as you don't wander too far from the White House and bump into a drug-related gang fight, there's nothing to fear. As Mr. Barry says, the murders are localized in a certain part of the city. Of course, I don't think that makes much difference to a US Senator who was nearly stuck in the middle of a shootout recently.

For some reason, I've always had this idea that a country's capital was a reflection of the rest of the country. I don't know where that idea came from. I don't know who put it inside my head, but I sure wish I could get it out.

The best television coverage of the presidential inauguration in January was on the network that flashed back and forth between Bush's address and the bag people roaming around the city. That's our nation's capital. Only a few city streets separate the most powerful and the richest people in the world from the weakest and the poorest. Only a few blocks separate all of Washington's splendor from the drugs, the pain, and the death.

Welcome. Welcome to Washington D.C., our nation's capital. Welcome to the United States.

Housing could care less

Living on campus is a privilege. Your classes are never more than a fifteen minute crawl, you don't have to worry about catching a bus to campus, cooking your own breakfast (because the D.C. is even closer than classes), or making friends because you're surrounded with neighbors. What an easy life!

Alise Harfield

What more could you want away from home?

I thought nothing, until relations with my roommate of this semester started going awry. So uncomfortable was living in that room that I decided, by myself, that moving out was the solution.

I'm sure every one reading this has either had a roommate conflict or knows someone who has. I have a friend whose roommate moved out leaving her with a "double single" – a room big enough for two but with only one occupant. She completely understood, and invited me to move in with her. She added that when her roommate moved out a few weeks before, she signed a form saying that she'd pay X dollars to keep hers a single room. She didn't want to deal with a stranger moving in, she'd had enough misery. Since she hadn't yet paid, we assumed there would be no problem.

At housing I explained the situation to a polite woman. She could see the effects the situation had on my face, and looked up my friend's name. Then she told me I could not move. I could move in with someone I'd never met before, but not my friend. She had to pay her X dollars, and no one could move in, whether she wanted me to or not.

It's not that I was left without an option. I did have the chance to jump, solo, from purgatory to hell by moving in with a stranger, not knowing if the situation with her would be even worse than the present one.

When I discussed the problem with my Assistant Residence Director, he assured me that mine was a special circumstance, and that surely, an exception could be made. He himself would call housing and explain the gravity of the issue.

In the meantime, I spent consecutive nights with a friend, planning to move out come the weekend. I relaxed a little, reminding myself that dorm life was indeed good. After all, when I had a problem, there was someone to turn to, someone who with his connection to Housing could get me out of this situation.

Hah! They refused his recommendation! They can't do without my friend's X dollars. She has to have this room to herself because at one time, some three weeks ago, she said she wanted it. So what that she called and said she wanted me to move in? So what that we are both dissatisfied? Or that the money doesn't even have to be refunded, just not paid? It's in the contract. Forget that because of many Stockbridge students graduating, there are over 300 empty rooms on campus this semester.

Now I question whether this life is such a privilege, having to live unhappily because a paper says so and a computer screen demands X dollars. If I move now, my friend will have paid her X dollars (not a scanty amount, either) for a single she won't have. Is that fair to her? Or is it fair if we split the fee?

It's ironic that Housing cares about X dollars more than the needs of students – students without whom 235 Whitmore would NOT even exist.

Gun control not the answer

Pamela McCarthy's column ("Inner-city target practice," March 30) was a true effort to understand gun control from both sides, but it misses the mark. McCarthy was very wise to point out the analogy between illegal guns and illegal drugs, for they are always related, but she errs with her charge that she doesn't condone the use of guns or drugs, so they should be illegal.

Paul Del Gallo

What needs to be understood here is that the law is not a pulpit from where we preach, but an institution from which to obtain order. The new restrictions on gun ownership, and the old restrictions on drug use, are an attempt by society to control the behavior of others. Of course, there are actions we do have the responsibility to control in another person. No sane person would defend the right to steal, kill, or rape. These are actions that affect other human beings; robbing them of life, of property, or of their humanity. But the use of drugs, though enormously stupid, is not an action that society can or should control. Similarly is the ownership of assault weapons, however unfortunate that may be.

Beyond the moral conflict of choosing laws that restrict people's basic civil liberties, let's look at the pragmatic side of gun control. In the state of Massachusetts, the assault weapons that are proposed banned compose only three of the 808 confiscated weapons collected last year. All three of them were obtained, carried, and used illegally. It's not as if the the trouble is the legal status of the guns, but instead the ability to enforce the law. Above all, this is the fact that if assault weapons are the fad of criminals and killers, what will we accomplish by criminalizing their possession? Black marketers in firearms will move next door to similar scum, the drug dealers, and set up shop. The high demand will create a high price for these lethal weapons, and upgrading the weapon to full automatics will be even more profitable. I hope it is understood where the money for these now expensive weapons will come from.

If you really want to damage the drug scourge, and the crimes of theft, bribery, and murder it's married to, decriminalize drugs. The reality of their use will not change, those who are wise will not take drugs and those who are fools will. With it no longer illegal, the use of assault weapons will be a non issue; the drug kings will be unemployed.

Someday soon, we must realize that laws like the drug laws and the firearm bans do not affect the behavior of the lawless, only the unfortunate police officers who must sleep in dumpsters and ally-ways to try and catch them. Someday we won't have many laws we cannot enforce, but a rigid few which we can.

Spitting – a nasty problem on the UMass campus

As I am walking through campus, I find myself dodging from side to side. Why am I doing this? No, I'm not having a seizure. Actually, I'm trying to avoid stepping on these globs of spit that are all over the place. I don't know about you, but seeing spit all over the ground really grosses me out.

Why are these globs of spit everywhere? I'm not really sure. All I know is that I'll be walking along when all of a sudden, the guy next to me will just spit onto the ground. I casually move away from him and keep walking.

Then I see a guy coming from the opposite direction who decides to release his excess saliva. But his spit was better than the last one. I mean this was a long-distance mound of spit; this guy must practice a great deal because his wad flew right past me. I'll be sure to say out of his shooting range next time I see him.

After a while I see another guy jogging. He's spitting in somewhat of a rhythm. One spit to the right, one spit to the left; one spit to the right, one spit to the left. . .maybe spitting helps him keep up his pace.

What possesses people to spit all over the place? It could just be a bad habit they just can't keep under control. Suddenly, you get this urge to spit, so you just let it out.

Minu Sebastian

For some people, it probably dates back to their childhood. You started spitting when you were a kid. It's okay, I understand. I used to do it, too. When I was a kid, we used to have contests. We'd all line up and see who could spit the farthest. We thought it was cool; all the tough, older kids did it. We had so much fun back then. But as I grew older, I realized I should stop. Fortunately, I grew out of it. For others, it's not so easy.

Some kids grow up spitting all the time and whenever the feel like it. Soon, they become addicted. They have unexplainable urges and they get really nervous until they finally get it out of their system. It becomes a habit; one they need to do two to three times a day. For some, it's more severe. They tend to spit more frequently – up to 10-15 times a day.

What these people need is therapy. They have to get help. It's a long, hard road through therapy, but you have to do it for your own sake and for the sake of those around you.

Admitting you have problem is the first step. This can often be the hardest step, but once you realize the problem exists, you can move on. You should then try to talk about the problem openly to others. At first, you'll only feel comfortable talking about it with your really close friends. But after a time, you'll be able to confront your family with your problem.

Fresh new material keeps Wright's ship afloat

By COSMO MACERO JR.

Steven Wright
John M. Greene Hall
April 1

Last Wednesday night, Steven Wright was rubbing shoulders with the Hollywood glitz at the 61st Annual Academy Awards presentation. Honored with Best Live Action Short for his Appointments of Dennis Jennings, the Boston native added another chapter to his book-length resume of comic achievements.

There was a time when having an original delivery style was enough (provided of course, you were funny) to leave a lasting mark on the comic scene. But upwardly mobile overachievers like Steve Martin and Robin Williams have put an end to the one-dimensional nature of the stand-up comedian, and a stint in Vegas is now only a beginning.

Accordingly, Wright has followed suit by (successfully) branching out into film, and thankfully, it's apparent that his unique stand-up routine has suffered nary a setback.

Saturday night at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall, Wright's hour plus show had a sold-out audience thinking twice at every moment. Delivering a surprising amount of new material, his impishly twisted view of life's more mundane aspects unfolded at a quick pace, taking into account his methodically slow delivery.

"My school colors were clear," he said. "I would say to people, 'I'm not naked, I'm in the band.'"

Wright most effectively finds humor in the curious characteristics of human nature. Most funny was his recollection of his grandfather conducting daily "elevator practice," making the children stand totally silent, side-by-side in a closet for three minutes a day.

Included in the night's routine were some prized one-liners which have remained staples in his act, "Hermits have no peer pressure," but have yet to become stale or tired. "There's a fine line between fishing and just standing on the shore like an idiot."

The show was like being on some kind of vessel, a ship or something. Wright's comments kept it going. He fueled the atmosphere at a steady pace, and the ship just kept moving along, no lulls in the performance, no loss of speed.

It's tougher and tougher to command an audience's attention these days, especially for more than 60 minutes. Sam Kinison screams his lungs out and Andrew Dice Clay curses his way to the front of the line, offending whoever and whatever on the way. While taking nothing away from either performer, it's clear that Steven Wright's approach hinges on the audience's anticipation of every sentence. The reactions almost beat the jokes to the gate. Any performer with such control over his audience is certainly on to something, in fact it's surprising that more comics haven't tried to experiment with (i.e. steal - ed.) his style.

"I bought a decaffeinated coffee table yesterday. You can't even tell the difference."

Top notch. And the ship's still moving.

■ Metallica

Comprised of drummer Lars Ulrich, guitarist Kirk Hammett, vocalist/guitarist James Hetfield and the newest member of the clan - bassist Jason Newsted, Metallica released . . . And Justice For All in late 1988. The album, marking the band's new beginning, is the first studio effort since the accident that took the life of bassist Cliff Burton two years ago.

". . . And Justice For All is a natural progression since Master of Puppets. The difference being our maturing as people, as musicians and our growing knowledge of each other's ideas and abilities," Newsted said.

Another area of change evident on this nine-song masterpiece is the initial acquiring of a new producer - enter one Mike Clink. But when things were not going as expected, the Metallica boys switched back to old-faithful, Fleming Rasmussen, to complete the project.

"When it came down to it, Clink was just not enough of a pusher or go-getter," Newsted said. "Fleming, on the other hand, becomes the fifth member of the band when he comes in. He knows exactly how things are supposed to be," he added.

One new venture for the band has come in the form of a made for MTV video. Written about the 1971 war movie Johnny Got His Gun, "One" is a song whose content details the horrifying reality of a veteran's living nightmare. Known primarily as a non image band, the actual surfacing of a Metallica video caught many off-guard. But according to Newsted, "The idea of making a video has been talked about for a long time. The thing that stopped us was finding something that we felt was strong enough to represent us. After writing the song, we found out about the movie (which was a screenplay from the book). So we watched the movie, picked out the individual clips to which we bought the rights and then spent one afternoon filming ourselves in a warehouse jamming."

Starting out primarily as an experiment, the video for "One" has done more than expected; breaking MTV request records and introducing the band to a whole new audience, including the eyes and ears of music's largest academy - The Grammy's.

With the addition of best heavy metal/hard rock performance category for this year's star-studded bonanza of awarding music's best, Metallica's current success made way for yet another opportunity.

"Playing on prime time television was pretty weird," replied Newsted, "The thing that was great was that we went there a few days before the show for a dress rehearsal. As we started loading in, the people working the set-up didn't know what was going on because most of the other band's on the agenda came in with little amps," he continued, "We had full stage gear. While rehearsing, I noticed that all the seats in the hall had posterboards with celebrities' 8x10 inch glossy photos on them. This was where they were to sit. Right in front of us were people like Joe Cocker, Rod Stewart, Quincy Jones and Stevie Wonder. That was really weird."

With all this behind them, Metallica prepared themselves for the evening's performance. Smoke began to seep from the edges of the stage held captive by the 14,000 devoted fans in attendance. Feelings of anxiety and excitement began to grow intensely. The seconds ticked louder and louder as all eagerly awated the arrival of their unsung heroes. With hearts pumping furiously, adrenalin flowing like that of an angered volcano, an explosion of energy was soon destined to emerge . . . It was at this point that the house lights went out.

Alumni band is tops in Boston pop

The Gordons? What kind of name is that for a band? The lyrics say it . . . and the alumni sing it.

Record Review

The Gordons are a four piece band comprised of UMass gradustes. Their eight song debut CD 100 Holidays is quite impressive, and should be hitting the airwaves soon.

Their songwriting is not the typical three lines interchanged with three other lines repeated nine times and an "Oh baby" and "Oh la la la " thrown in. There is considerable strength in their compositions.

The band's three part harmonies enrich the fine music. The Boston Globe described them as being, "An effervescent pop band with a strong 60's influence." Each song possess it's own definitive style and personality.

The Gordons are big in the Boston area and at Tufts University. Past gigs at the Hatch, and at Nightstage in Cambridge have been well received., and the band looks forward to traveling to New York for performances there.

100 Holidays (on the Independent Expressway label), is a good choice for your collection. The Gordons are a band to watch, and have proved that there is hope after graduation.

Bad weekend for me. My family life is spent. My sister's husband is gloating because he had just enough self control to refrain from chain whipping me over dinner on Saturday night. I still had that semi-viscous sweat on the small of my back when I got back to Hamp, just in time to see a fired up Wolverine squad humble the Illini in the semis, thus eliminating me from the Collegian pool. I don't need the money anyway. I'm outta here in three months so I figure I don't have to pay any more bills. The warm weather is just around the corner so Cernak Oil will just have to mellow out for a while, a long while.

There was a package, from Italy, waiting for me when I got home. Two pre-mixed Campari and Sodas, complete with instructions, from the old country. My roomate just bought a CD player and though he has just two disks I settled into the ottoman for a few hours of uninterrupted technological genius. If he never bought anything besides Daydream Nation and Exile on Main Street his collection just might be complete. When they first released Daydream... I thought that Sonic Youth had erred. It grew on me though. A much quieter sound but produced to the hilt. The ability of Thurston and Lee to layer the guitar tracks continues to blaze new trails and open wider the running sore that is quality rock and roll.

After I finished with the Campari and the Youth I popped on my 15 year old copy of Decade. For some reason the hiss that has accumulated over the years makes Neil Young sound even better. The Died Pretty just released a cover of Neil's "When you Dance" to follow up their recent success with the LP Lost. I remember when I heard my first Died Pretty Song. My disfigured friend Hot Pants and I had just finished a fairly brutal session with a twelve pack of Meister Brau and were struggling to get his Impala up the hill to the solid steel house that his father had built in order to insure family safety. Those were good times. Good Boston based college radio spitting out the best eleven minute rock songs that Australia had to offer.

The Collegian softball team kicks into action tomorrow at lower Boyden with yours truly on the mound. Our catcher, and news editor, is my favorite whipping boy at the Newsroom but tomorrow we start our hunt, together, for triumph, and whatever blood we can spill on the way. Softball is for the soft hearted but my nerves these days are like the electrical cable that runs through the floor in death row at the Florida State Penitentiary.

Malarians save Cafe from junk poets

Beat Cafe
Hampden Theatre
April 1

Walking into Hampden Theatre last Saturday night was like walking into a time machine set back thirty years. Hampden played host to this year's final installment of "Beat Cafe", which was headlined by local rock faves The Malarians, and included jazz and poetry readings.

UMass jazz quintet Full Contact opened the evening with modern jazz, including a scorcher from the pen of Theloniuos Monk. Poets John Goulding and Kelly Everding followed. Goulding's poetry was nothing more than intense intellectual babble about torment, while Everding, though every bit as intense, was more humorous.

Charles Carrol, suffering from laryngytis, recited the works of beatnik poets. He greatly overacted and caused much of the audience to walk out.

By the time The Malarians took the stage, much of the crowd had left. Those who stayed got a taste of what it would be like if the Moody Blues merged with the Ramones. The band, who describe their sound as "early proto-surf-folk neo-rock", is fronted by keyboardest, vocalist Mal Thursday. Dressed in Blues Brothers attire, Thursday's antics and one liners kept the crowd in stiches. During a technical malfunction, Thursday improvised a poem, Death of a Mauve Bat, "to keep in the spirit of the evening".

Blending psychedelia with hardcore, and playing almost all new material, the band scored best on their driving, punklike tunes, such as "Get Out of Dallas", which Thursday introduced as his childhood fantasy of saving John Kennedy's life.

They closed the show with two more driving tunes, "Mighty Yighty" and "Good Time", which got the crowd dancing for the first time all evening.

Beat the Bondo bores at C McD's

By WILLIAM JAMES
Collegian Correspondent

In Northampton, a simple and friendly "Wanna get a cup of coffee?" would normally invariably be followed by the back of the mind dread of the chem. depend. babes quietly screaming for attention, or the angst-ridden pseudoartistes looking glamorously pathetic - in short, the numerous and tiresome variations on what passes for cool in Western Mass, known to those in the know as "hick chic."

But there is hope for the haggard cynic who just wants a cup of coffee and maybe a quiet chat. It comes in the form of Cafe C McD's tucked away beneath the La Cazuela on Old South Street. Little things like very good and comparatively inexpensive coffee, coupled with excellent pastries and a friendly staff make this recently opened business attractive. Then there's the aesthetics -- very open, well-lit with art on the walls that neither merits nor receives scorn. A good stock of newspapers, big ashtrays, and even charming little bathrooms. But these are things any business can acheive with a little savvy and taste.

But C McD's has the all-important ingredient - a clean and pleasant atmosphere. The air of sad pretentiousness is not so prevalent and if the word "nice" was not such a derogatory term it would be well placed.

And the eclairs (all patries are C McD made) are the best. So have it and eat it too. Enjoy.

The Black experience in Britain:

The historical dimension

Collegian File Photo
Prof. Stephen Small

By STEPHEN SMALL
Special to the Collegian

The following is the third in a series of articles to provide a historical analysis of blacks in Britain and their relationship to blacks America.

It doesn't make much sense to attempt an understanding of the black experience in this country without some knowledge of slavery, Jim Crow segregation and the ,migration from the south. Similarly, it makes little sense to look at blacks in England without some knowledge of their past. And over there, black history is shaped as much by the British Empire, as it is by our presence in England itself.

Slavery in England did not occur on plantations; it happened in the manors and mansions of the aristocracy.

The most distinctive aspect of this history is the unity we created in England, and with blacks in America and Africa, to achieve our common goals. Regardless of the personal threats to themselves, blacks came together and joined their brothers and sisters throughout the diaspora to demand freedom. In this respect, the history of blacks in England and America is inextricably entwined.

Blacks have been in England since Roman times but little is known about their activities except that they commanded soldiers and often held high positions. From the 1550s, blacks became more widely reported in England and by 1596 had even caught the attention of Queen Elizabeth I. She issued a proclamation demanding their extradition because they were "infidels" and the country was facing economic pressures. Blacks probably watched Shakespeare's plays, and who knows how much the character of Othello was shaped by their presence!

Blacks ended up in Britain as slaves, and they went as sailors. They went direct from Africa, but others first experienced the atrocities of slavery in the sugar colonies And many went on the losing side of the British after the American Revolution. The black community had many dimensions. Paupers and beggars, servants and domestics, students and scholars, and even the companions and escorts of royalty. Yet all suffered the adversities of racial hostility.

The black contribution to the wealth of the British Empire has been well documented. The city of Liverpool consisted of a few huts until its involvement in slavery made it the biggest port in the country. But black influence on English life and political culture is less well known.

Most blacks in England were free. At their peak in 1715 the black population was estimated to number 15,000. Most of the slaves were personal servants and status symbols to the nobility. There were no plantations and most of the agricultural work was done by poor whites.

Though their numbers were never large, their presence gave rise to considerable controversy. James Somersett was brought to England as a slave. He escaped and upon being recaptured his master tried to return him to the West Indies. The noted abolitionist, Granville Sharp, got involved in the case and in 1772 Lord High Chief Justice Mansfield returned a decision that no person could forcibly be removed from English soil. It was interpreted as the abolition of slavery, but in fact many blacks continued to be held in bondage until the institution was abolished throughout the British Empire in 1838.

Blacks had been an active influence on the Mansfield decision. They continually offered resistance and fled their masters, seeking refuge in the small but cohesive communities of blacks in England's ports. Together they helped each other, offered mutual comfort and support, and struggled to end slavery everywhere.

Blacks were also found in the highest courts of the land. Olaudah Equiano, Ottobah Cuguano, Ignatius Sancho and Job Ben Soloman were highly educated blacks that moved in high circles Though they frequented the courts of the aristocracy they never lost sight of their brothers and sisters. All active campaigners against slavery, speaking at meetings, writing books and inspiring others. Their fight did not end with abolition; they campaigned for racial equality in America and against the double injustices black women faced and became a heroine as a nurse in the Crimean war. Other blacks, too, were part of the English working class struggle in the Chartist movement, and in the formation of trade unions.

As blacks united, a network was extended across the Atlantic and a warm welcome offered. Phyllis Wheatly, Frederick Douglass and Booker T. Washington all visited England. In the 1890's the indefatigable W.E.B. Du Bois went to England. At the turn of the century Marcus Garvey found his way way there too. And in the 1930s Jomo Kenyatta, Kwame Nkrumah and Julius Nyerere - each of whom later became the leader of an African nation - came together in the Pan-African Congress for African liberation.

> "A people without a knowledge of their history and culture is like a tree without roots."
> – Marcus Garvey

Although few people know much about it, blacks in England began a tradition of sustained resistance to injustice. From those in the most abject poverty to the richest and educated, blacks came together in common purpose and with united spirit. Through political activity they forged international links that reverberated throughout the British Empire. Though spread throughout the diaspora they used innovation and ingenuity to stay alive and to sustain our community.

In contemporary America, as well as in England, we would do well to learn from the heroism and solidarity of our forebears. Those who went beyond our differences to demand and defend the interests of black people as a community.

Next week we look at the trials and tribulations of blacks as post-war immigrants.

Director of CCEBMS resigns

By JOSEPH L HILL JR.
Collegian Staff

Paul W. Barrows, the Director of the CCEBMS Program and Assistant Professors in African Studies has resigned. He held this position for the past seven years. He has accepted a position as special assistant to the chancellor at the University of Wisconsin -Madison. His last day at the university will be April seventh.

CCEBMS is the oldest and largest minority program at the university and in the state. As director, he was responsible for the recruitment and retention of minority students and in the general improving of the quality of life, which according to Barrows is "advocating across the campus for CCEBMS students."

Barrows spent his first year gathering information and getting to know people. The needs of the program became clear in the second year. The most immediate need was to increase the number of CCEBMS students.

In the Fall 1982, three months after he became director, there were approximately 400 CCEBMS students. Two years later the number of students went up to 700, almost double. One year later CCEBMS started its first summer program and have had five successful programs since then.

Barrows wrote the proposal for it as well as the proposal for a grant from Digital Equipment Corp. The grant was given to CCEBMS and used to set up the Benjamin Bannaker computer facility. The grant was worth 180,000 worth of computer equipment. Ernie Allen, of the Afro-American studies department, collaborated with him. The grand opening of the center was this past Saturday.

According to Barrows, some of the things the program will have to look at in the near future are "the Tillis report, [which] made some major recommendation about restructuring the program, the computer center is now ready but we do not have staffing, we need a coordinator, instructional educational software, a TA and other student staff so we can get maximum utilization out of this [program]."

Presently, the CCEBMS Board of Directors are working with the university to name an acting person and to set-up a national search for a permanent director.

"The university needs to address the whole social climate here. The number of CCEBMS freshmen is decreasing because students see this place in the media and they think racism is running rampant here, and that it is a hostile alien environment, and there is some substance to that and the university must honestly and straight fowardly begin to better address this problem and do something about it so Black students will feel comfortable and nurtured and not alienated." said Barrows about the administrations commitment to the students served by the program.

Barrows also said that "the next director will have to establish a very positive relationship with the administration, [as] I have not had the kind of relationship with the administration that I wish I could have had. Its been more of an adversarial kind of relationship."

Barrows' new job will be to implement a comprehensive document called the Madison report which addresses all minority related concerns on the campus in a concise and coordinated way.

Namibia gains independence, but uncertainty continues

By THOMAS MAMBANDE
Collegian Staff
and The Associated Press

This weekend, the country of Namibia began its transition from being Africa's so-called last colony to independence.

At 6 a.m. yesterday, a formal cease-fire took place between South Africa and the guerilla group SWAPO, the South-West African People's Organization. SWAPO had been fighting to end South Africa's 74-year rule over Namibia.

In spite of a formal declaration by South Africa for an official end to its control and subsequent celebrations in the streets by Namibians, South Africa reported violent clashes with SWAPO on Saturday and said that it may ask the United Nations peace-keeping force to leave.

South African Foreign Minister Pik Botha said Saturday that 38 SWAPO guerillas and two territorial policemen from South Africa were killed following a SWAPO infiltration into Namibia from Angola on Friday evening.

SWAPO, which has waged war for independence against South Africa since 1966, is undisputed as the preeminent political party in Namibia. South Africa, until recently, had refused to acknowledge the country's right of self-government.

Last December, after 74 years of rule and 23 years of active revolt by SWAPO, agreed to a U.N.-sponsored independence plan for Namibia as part of a southwestern Africa accord that also requires the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola.

Under the accord, South African and SWAPO forces were confined to their bases as of Saturday. Botha claims SWAPO has violated the accord and, as a result, he has complained to U.N. Secretary General Perez de Cuellar.

Unless there is a satisfactory response from the United Nations, Botha said South Africa would feel compelled to ask the U.N. peace-keeping forces to leave "until SWAPO can be brought to its senses."

At an airport news conference, Botha said certain South African units would be released from their bases to provide support to the police and the U.N. group would monitor the South African movement.

BMCP holds first communication conference

By SHIRLEY A. JONES
Collegian Correspondent

This past Saturday 25 people were in attendance at the first annual BMCP [Black Mass Communication Project] Communications Conference. The event was held in the Student Union Ballroom between the hours of 11am to 1pm.

Dwight Ellis, from the National Association of Broadcasters and the Vice-President of Minority and Special Services was to give keynote speaker. Pam Cross of Ch.5 [Boston] and Tanya Hart Ch.4 [Boston] also spoke.

According to Ellis, America has undergone a revolution, "for the first time in 20 years a new [Black] generation is coming of age," and they are finally on the right side of history. He stressed that our society is a mosaic of many colors and cultures, and is rapidly becoming a non-white community as we go into the 21st century.

Black males, according to the lecturer, are a endangered species in the communications industry. Although White women dominate the field today minorities have made some significant inroads, specifically Black women. Black men have seen their number in the field decrease significantly in recent history. Ellis urged Black men to double their efforts in this field. Pam Cross focused her discussion on news and news reporting. She felt that minorities too often focus their attention on one aspect of the field of communications on should broaden their horizons and investigate news reporting. Cross suggested that students take internships to help them obtain more experience in the field.

Tanya Hart discussed the need for people to understand the politics of the organizations they will work for. The politics include having good relations with people you will be working with, especially your boss.

According to Hart, being a reporter requires you to think on your feet. In the reporting business "the medium is the message," said Hart. She also said that "a person should never forget who they are or where they come from and that we [Blacks] have a responsibility to communicate to others what we have learned."

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Be more realistic where finances are concerned. Paddle your own canoe but seek experts' advice when necessary. Your kindness pays off in unusual ways. Romance gives you new hope for the future.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Forge ahead with your career plans. Learning high-tech skills will boost your earning potential. Set aside time to lend to an older person's needs. A child shares a big secret.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Many different concerns will occupy your attention today. Put business first, however, and use your authority wisely. A work change will increase not only your efficiency but your comfort. Welcome innovative ideas.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Your financial affairs may be linked to someone else's. Make sure you retain your share of control. Partners are more cooperative than in the recent past. Show appreciation for their efforts.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) You recognize a golden opportunity and pursue it. A heavier workload is part of the picture. If swamped, do not hesitate to ask for help. Keep family expenses within reasonable limits.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Commitments made today will bring you new prestige and financial security. Higher-ups become aware of your improved work performance. Return phone calls promptly to avoid missing an unusual opportunity. Adventure beckons!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Postpone signing papers or traveling. Events on the home front demand your attention. A challenge is settled, giving you a chance to fly your wings. Showcase your talents to best advantage.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Expect good news, welcome invitations and more romance! Expanding your social circle will lead to some wonderful times. Do not rock the boat at work or you could cause unnecessary problems for yourself.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) A new project receives backing from an unexpected quarter. You are surprised and delighted! Do not try to borrow money or valuable items today. Learn to keep friendship separate from business.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Communication with an attractive member of opposite sex becomes difficult: cool it until you are in a more positive mood. A job tip could lead to a second career. Follow up.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) A conflict with authority figures will require all the patience and diplomacy you can muster. However, do stand your ground if someone tries to take unfair advantage. Your high standards are admirable.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Be tolerant if you have to deal with emotional family members or people at a distance. Business will look better later this afternoon. Entertaining potential customers is a smart move.

but it was the last run which they would get.

The Hawks fought back, and Mike Bylone eventually won it with a pinch-hit, two-run single in the bottom of the seventh off UMass reliever Jerry Creamer. Rich Graham took the loss for the Minutemen.

Graham was the second of four UMass pitchers in the game, as starter Brian Conroy lasted into the fourth inning, allowing five runs, four of them earned. Jeff Richardson pitched to one batter in the seventh, issuing an intentional walk.

In the first game, Ciaglo handled things all by himself. The junior lefthander threw a three-hitter, striking out eight while walking just one.

"It was another great outing for Ciaglo," Stone said.

A solo homer by Bright, a suicide squeeze bunt by Tom Murray and a steal of home by senior co-captain Steve Kern were all the offense the Minutemen needed in the game.

deep and down the line, all Kon Jancic could do was lob the ball, which just made it over the net. Gable came in and put the shot away with a winner volley.

Chris Johnson, at the number two position, won his match against John Sheehan, 6-1, 6-2. Johnson's total concentration evidently paid off resulting in his top-spin one-handed backhand, and overhead smashes.

Paul Audet played third singles against Rick Gacbato, and won 6-0, 7-5. Audet's consistent down-the-line and cross-court shots aided his second set comeback, from down 1-4 to the win.

Humberto Soto, at number five singles, played the longest match, 6-4, 7-6, winning the tiebreaker 9-7. Rich Stone at number four and Glen Peck at number six also added wins to the UMass victory.

The three doubles, Gable and Johnson at number one, Audet and Stone at two, and Lenny Levine and Matt Murphy at three, all took straight set wins over the Bonnies' doubles teams.

Now with one win racketed, the team is going to be practicing hard for the tough matches.

"The big ones are going to be Providence, Central Connecticut and Hartford. Central Connecticut and Hartford are always close," Roberts said. "Last year we beat both, but that was last year.

"The first real test will be when we play the University of Rhode Island [April 10]. This will tell how we'll fair against the tougher teams, and give us a good idea of how we'll do the rest of the season," Roberts said.

"The team has a lot going for them," Roberts said. "Johnson, Audet and Stone are playing incredibly well, and Gable is amazing. But for us to beat Providence, which we didn't do last season, they'll have to play the best tennis with no mistakes. We came in fifth at the Atlantic 10 tournament with Providence ahead of us at number four."

UMass will now face Holy Cross Wednesday in Worcester.

exited the Princeton contest to receive five stitches above her right eye after being hit with a foul ball, returned to hurl her second win of the season with a strong game against the Huskies (7-6).

UConn had jumped out to a 1-0 lead in the second inning when with two outs and runners on first and second, UMass right fielder Bonnie Schilling dropped a fly ball just inside of the foul line.

UMass immediately made up the lost ground in the bottom half of the frame as Jennifer Miller singled home Aprile from second.

The Gorillas still led 6-3 after Greg Collins scored with 3:40 gone in the third. But St. John's got goals from Bugge and Walt Grabinowitz to close the gap to 6-5 and set the stage for the tight final period.

"We didn't expect an easy game," Garber said. "I thought maybe we could get a little better lead, but they put on good full-field pressure. The first half we had trouble clearing the ball. The man with the ball couldn't find anyone open."

Turnovers, which caused problems against Cornell, were still a factor for the Gorillas against the Redmen.

"We threw the ball away a lot on offense," Garber said. "The first half we got a couple of goals, and I thought we might blow it open, but we forced some passes and just missed connecting on others.

"We weren't very patient. The nature of our game is to run and gun, but we can't come down and throw the ball away," Garber said.

There were several players that stood out in the game, particularly Ganci. The senior attack's eight points padded his season totals to 14 goals and 11 assists.

"I know Ganci can play that way," Garber said. "He's probably our most underrated and unknown player, and he's probably our fastest. He came up with some key ground balls."

Garber also praised Feinberg, a junior midfielder playing again in place of the injured senior co-captain Chris Zusi. Feinberg picked up a pair of goals.

"Marc had a great game. He ran up and down the field like a wild man," Garber said.

Gorilla Grumblings: UMass will host Brown on Wednesday in the first of four games broadcast on New England Sports Network this year. Home games with Dartmouth and Syracuse, as well as a game at Harvard will also be featured . . . it was a homecoming of sorts for the Gorillas, as 20 of the players on the roster hail from Long Island . . . in comparison, every player on the St. John's roster is from New York state.

season ahead," Husted said.

Following Friday's rainout against Hawaii, UMass came out raring to go on Saturday. The cold, windy and awful conditions that persisted throughout the match did not even seem to phase the Minutewomen at all.

UMass swept the three doubles matches and reeled off five of six singles victories. Singles winners included number two Maura Foley (6-4, 6-4), No. 3 Gail Girasella (6-1, 6-0), No. 4 Kerry Eddy (6-1, 6-1), and fifth and sixth singles players Shizuko Yamaski and McShane, also in straight sets.

The best match of the day came in the number one doubles where Vanessa Kirschner and Yamaski squeaked out a victory in the third set tiebreaker. Other doubles teams to win were No. 2 Allison Agnew and Tonya Sides and number three Kim Morgan and Sarah Nadolny.

The Bonnies, who were playing their first spring schedule ever, got their lone victory at number one singles.

"We just won in all aspects, a convincing win for us," Husted said.

Next up for the 1-0 Minutewomen will be their last home match, Thursday against the University of Connecticut.

Cleary, Harvard finally gain respect

Crimson get first NCAA title in Minnesota's own backyard

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) — Where does one begin to tell the life story of this Harvard hockey team?

How about with coach Bill Cleary, Ryan O'Neal's stand-in during the hockey scenes in the movie "Love Story"?

"A lot of people have questioned the coach's judgment over the years," said freshman goalie Chuckie Hughes, who made 33 saves Saturday night to help Harvard to its first NCAA title with a 4-3 overtime victory over Minnesota. "But he usually makes the right decisions. It was nice to win one for coach."

Cleary, considered one of the greatest athletes in Harvard history and one of the best US-born players ever, has had many outstanding moments.

As a player, he led Harvard to third place in the NCAA tournament in 1955 and skated for two US Olympic teams — including the gold-medal 1960 club at Squaw Valley, Calif.

In 18 years as Crimson coach, he has a 311-187-21 record and nine NCAA tournament appearances.

And, of course, he skated for the Oliver Barrett character when "Love Story" shifted from the bedroom to the blue line.

"That was just a fun experience, to see what it was like to be in a movie," Cleary said. "I did all the action scenes — the skating, the fighting — for Ryan O'Neal.

"I offered to do other scenes, too, but they wouldn't let me do anything with Ali MacGraw."

Of all these moments, however, none are as sweet as his most recent.

"At this moment," he said, "this is the best."

Cleary's best of times were Minnesota's worst of times. Despite making eight tournament appearances in the 1980s, the Gophers didn't win a title during the decade.

"We were so close," said goalie Robb Stauber, who couldn't stop Ed Krayer's backhander 4:16 in overtime. "It's really painful when you work so hard for something and you keep coming up short."

This was the year the Gophers were truly supposed to win it all. It was regarded as one of their strongest teams ever and the tournament was played at the St. Paul Civic Center, just a slap shot from campus.

"It would've been very nice to see this place erupt," Minnesota's Jon Anderson said. "If we'd have scored (in overtime), the roof might've blown off. We wanted to win it in front of our fans."

The Gophers, 34-11-3, in their 16th trip to the tournament, last won the title in 1979.

Beating Minnesota in St. Paul was especially satisfying for Harvard, 31-3-0, which, in its 14th tourney appearance, became only the third eastern school in the last 17 years to win the championship. Boston University (1978) and Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (1985) were the others.

After scoring twice in Thursday's 6-3 semifinal victory over Michigan State, Krayer had hoped Minnesota would also reach the final.

"I knew it would be a great game," he said. "Playing in their backyard, with 15,000 screaming fans, I knew it would make the victory that much sweeter.

"We wanted to show everybody out here that eastern schools can play hockey, too. Harvard is just as good a hockey school as Minnesota, Michigan State or anybody else."

"Out West, you hear the criticism," said Hughes, who has won four straight championships including three Massachusetts high school crowns at Catholic Memorial. "Bobby Reynolds (of Michigan State) said, "Thank God we're not playing Minnesota' (in the semifinals)," he said. "Lake Superior State thought they were going to beat us to a pulp (in the quarterfinals).

"Nobody likes to be called a loser. Nobody likes to be told they're not good. We may not be te biggest team, but you've got to catch us to hit us."

Hughes started even though classmate Allain Roy was outstanding in the semifinals. Cleary said he wasn't about to change his season-long policy of alternating the two goalies just because a championship was at stake.

"A lot of people questioned coach about not playing me after (a victory over Boston College," Hughes said. "But I knew that if I didn't play, Allain was going to do a great job and if I did play, hopefully I would do a great job."

On Saturday, he outplayed his more heralded opponent, Stauber, last year's Hobey Baker Award winner as the nation's top collegian.

In the overtime, Stauber stopped Brian McCormack's shot. But the rebound went to Krayer, who took one stride to the bottom of the right faceoff circle, slid a backhander along the ice and beat Stauber low to the stick side.

"I didn't even see it go in," Stauber said. "I just looked . . . (goal) light's on . . . that was it."

After the game, Cleary briefly addressed the Gophers, almost apologizing for his team's victory.

"I told them it was too bad anybody had to lose," he said. "It was such a great game, I was sorry that anybody lost."

Obviously Cleary didn't remember the "Love Story" script. Otherwise he would have realized that victory means never having to say you're sorry.

Hoop contest taking shape

After numerous exhausting hours of tabulation, we've finally figured out exactly what will happen in the Collegian NCAA hoop contest after tonight's championship game between Seton Hall and Michigan.

If Michigan wins, Frederick Kleiman, who currently leads the pack with 97 points, will be the overall winner. Because of his high point total, Kleiman has secured a spot in the top three regardless of tonight's outcome.

Following him would be Tom Sassi in second place (89 points), who also has locked up fourth if Seton Hall wins, and Karen Bourque (84 points), who likewise will take fifth place. Nicholas Forsyth-Fandetti (83) and Steve Kingman (80) would round out the top five.

If Seton Hall wins, the overall champion would be Dan Lathrop, who currently has 85 points, and would finish with 98 points, one ahead of Kleiman for the title. In second is James Clark (not the sports editor, who was maimed again by North Carolina loyalty), currently with 84 (but would win a tie with Kleiman for picking the correct winner), followed by Kleiman, Sassi and Bourque.

Shame on the seven people who picked Michigan to make the finals, but didn't pick a winner. And also to the poor nameless sole who finished with 16 points. Yes, there is hope for some of us.

Men's lacrosse slips by St. John's, 10-8

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

JAMAICA, N.Y. — It's called deja vu — the feeling that somehow, somewhere, this has all happened before.

Saturday, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team suffered a bit of this, except it was done with mirrors, as the Gorillas escaped St. John's University with a 10-8 win.

Last Wednesday, UMass fought a constant uphill battle against Cornell University, but could never forge ahead in dropping a 12-11 heartbreaker for its first loss of the season. Against St. John's, the Gorillas were on the other end, at the top of the hill, playing King of the Mountain and trying to push the Redmen over the edge.

The Gorillas never led by more than three goals and weren't able to really breathe a sigh of relief until the final tick had dropped off the clock.

"St. John's is coming along. They're certainly a much-improved team," said UMass coach Dick Garber.

"That was the best game we played all season," said Redman coach Bill Miltenberg. "We've worked hard at it."

The Redmen came into the game with a 1-4 mark, but hadn't been blown out of any game this year. And their progress showed Saturday, as they had the Gorillas tied as late as the 11-minute mark of the fourth quarter.

The men's lacrosse team survived a scare by edging St. John's, 10-8 Saturday in Jamaica, NY.

Down just 6-5 entering the final period, St. John's tied it for the first time right off the faceoff as Chris Johnston snuck downfield and bounced one past UMass goalie Sal LoCascio from about 35 feet out at 0:14.

St. John's, which had been tip-toeing back all game, looked as if it finally had the Gorillas on the ropes. But it was dealt a blow when Andrew Bolger dealt a blow to the head of a UMass player with his stick and got whistled for a minute penalty.

With the man-up, UMass retook the lead at 2:39 on Tim Soudan's second goal of the game, a rifle shot from 30 feet out.

The Redmen would tie it one last time on Brian Bugge's goal off a good 3-on-2 break, but that would be it. The Gorillas finally took the lead for good on Paul Ganci's third goal of the game at the right post off a feed from Jim McAleavey.

They had the lead, but it was never solid, even after a scramble at midfield resulted in Marc Feinberg breaking in all alone for a goal off a long Ganci (five assists) pass with 6:06 left in the game to make it 9-7.

A goal by William Cantwell was cancelled out by McAleavey after Rob Codignotto stole an errant back pass at midfield and flipped it to Ganci, who found McAleavey all alone at the post for easy pickings past SJ goalie Sal LoBosco with 1:19 left.

It should have just about been Miller time, but a double penalty against UMass with 59 seconds left gave the Redmen a two-man advantage. The UMass man-down squad, which had to kill 12 penalties in all, shut St. John's down to finally seal the win.

"Our man-down game won the game for us," Garber said. "The last minute we were two-down, and it seemed we were down the whole game."

Despite the 12 penalties, UMass allowed only two man-down goals, and even had one of its own while shorthanded.

The Gorillas were in much better shape in the early going, taking a 3-1 lead after one and extending that to 5-2 at the half. It may have been more, as it seemed that about four minutes mysteriously ticked off the clock near the end of the first quarter. Or it could have been less, save for a Soudan tally with 12 seconds to go in the opening stanza and a Feinberg goal that beat the halftime buzzer.

Softball team sweeps Princeton, Connecticut

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Nobody on this end of the country had seen them play in California. All that was known about this year's model of the University of Massachusetts softball team was that they came home with a 3-10 record, and appeared ready to yield their traditionally lofty status in Northeast regional play.

Now they know better. Forced out of the scheduled "Huskie Classic" by rain, the University of Connecticut and Princeton softball squads rerouted themselves to Amherst for a three game round robin yesterday. The Minutewomen (now 5-10) emerged from the fray with a 2-0 win over the Tigers and a 3-1 defeat of UConn.

The Huskies had come to town as the top ranked team in the region. Princeton held the third slot in the most recent coach's poll.

"I don't think anybody should take us lightly," said UMass head coach Elaine Sortino. "We did a lot of damage."

UMass rode a fine tuned defense to both victories; the lone run surrendered against UConn was unearned. And just as the pre-season hype had predicted, credit Chris Wanner on the mound and Barbara Meehan at the plate for much of UMass's sudden success.

Wanner blanked Princeton (11-6) in the first game of the day, as junior Mary Duff bunted home twice as many runs as the Minutewomen would need. With a teammate on first, Duff's bunt drew an errant throw that rolled down the right field line, allowing both Minutewomen to score.

Up against UConn ace Sherri Arnold in the second game of the afternoon, Meehan snapped a 1-1 tie (and a slight personal hitting drought) with a two run triple in the eighth inning. Freshman Holly Aprile, who

Tennis teams net wins

By BRAD HALFOND

In an unexpected early season show of power, the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team dominated St. Bonaventure University en route to a season-opening victory Saturday at the Upper Boyden Courts.

The Minutewomen won all but one match as they began the 1989 campaign on a positive note. Karen McShane, the captain and lone senior on the squad, said, "We gained a lot of confidence from this victory, we did what we had to do to win."

First-year coach Mike Husted was also happy with his team's performance.

"Our goal was to come out strong and play really well. It was a good opener for us and hopefully this sets the tone for the

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team began its spring season Saturday with a 9-0 sweep over St. Bonaventure University at the Upper Boyden Courts.

"It was a good way for us to start the season," said UMass coach Manny Roberts.

Although the weather was cold, the men were hot, serving up some great tennis. Brian Gable at first singles beat St. Bonaventure's top player, Jim Koc Jancic, 6-1, 6-1. Even though Gable is just coming back from an ankle injury his moves on the court were solid and consistent.

Baseball gets a split against St. Joseph's

Second A-10 twinbill set for this afternoon

By MATT GERKE

PHILADELPHIA — They didn't do it on the day they expected, and they didn't do it in the way they would have liked to, but the University of Massachusetts baseball team finally got the Atlantic 10 Conference season underway.

Paul Ciaglo threw a gem in the first game yesterday, only to see his teammates blow a lead in the second game, as UMass split with St. Joseph's University, winning 3-0 and losing 8-7. The Minutemen, 1-1 in the conference and 6-7 overall, will square off with St. Joe's (6-12 and 3-5 in the A-10) in another doubleheader today, because rain washed out Saturday's doubleheader.

Despite a win on the road, UMass was not happy with the overall results yesterday, after squandering a five-run lead in the second game.

"We've got to win games like that," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We had a chance to blow it open and we didn't. We just didn't execute."

The Minutemen had taken a lead in the first inning, when freshman Glenn DiSarcina led off the game with a double off the center field fence and eventually scored on a fielder's choice.

In the third, RBI singles by Drew Seccafico, Drew Comeau and Brian Bright and a St. Joe's error helped UMass expand its lead to 5-1.

Dave Edwards added a two-run home run in the fourth for the Minutemen,

Local bar owners protest fee hike

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

The proposed hike in liquor license fees, if passed, will hurt Amherst civic and charitable organizations, members of the Amherst Hospitality Association told Select Board members last night.

"We spend more money on local activities and teams than we do on liquor licenses," said Miles Washburn, co-owner of the Spoke, a bar in downtown Amherst. "If the proposal is passed, then we will have to cut back, and these organizations will suffer — the money has to come from somewhere."

The proposed increase would double the price of an all-alcohol license in Amherst, from the current $2,500 to $5,000. A wine and malt license, now $600, would also cost $5,000. The same fees in Northampton are $1,300 and $565, respectively.

The hospitality industry contributes money each year to the Amherst Girl Scouts, Little League teams in Amherst, the Clark House Thanksgiving Dinner, Goodwill Industries and other miscellaneous fund raising activities, according to members of the Amherst Association.

"This proposal is a vote against these agencies," said Bob DiCarlo, of Cafe DiCarlo. "Just because there are big lines on Friday and Saturday night, they assume we have multi-million dollar businesses. They should come down on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday night. We don't have a whole lot of people there."

At a previous Select Board meeting, Selectman Richard Minear said the bar owners could pass the increase on to customers.

"We just can't do that. Where are we go-

Dunlap dumps senators from SGA roll

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Five undergraduate student senators were dropped from the roll yesterday in an unprecedented move by Senate Speaker John Dunlap, because of their failure to submit applications to serve on senate or University-wide committees.

The senators were among 26 members of the Student Government Association required to file a committee application by noon yesterday or face expulsion from the SGA.

Dunlap said he expects sparks to fly at the senate meeting tomorrow night over his actions, but said he refuses to overturn his ruling.

Removed from the roll were: Sen. Stewart Fife, who is also president of the Central Area Government, vocal conservative Sen. Brian Darling, Sen. Melina Sammy from the Third World Caucus and Sen. Doug Morash.

"They want my head," Dunlap said, adding that he will remain adamant in upholding the ruling. "If I don't stand my ground, then I'm useless as speaker for the rest of this year."

Co-Sens. Michael Partridge and Stanley Drasky were also expelled but Dunlap said Partridge may have missed the noon deadline because of illness and will be reinstated pending a doctor's note.

Dunlap said he expects several filibusters protesting his action, which he claims will make the senate more efficient by bolstering committee attendance, but added that filibustering will stall the appeals process.

"My ruling stands until they appeal it, so filibusters will only expand the amount of time they aren't senators," he said. "If I start to alter my acts for fear of a filibuster the whole senate might as well be thrown out the window."

A majority vote of the senate will overturn Dunlap's actions and reinstate the senators, but he said such an event would contradict the senate's purpose.

"I would be disgusted [if the ruling is overturned]," he said. "What can I do with a body that overturns its own rules?"

Sen. Sammy, a freshman, said she plans to appeal her expulsion claiming an illness prevented her from submitting an application which she said she has prepared for the academic affairs committee.

"I wasn't aware of how important it was to join the committees," Sammy said, explaining why she failed to apply earlier. "I don't want people to think I've let them down."

Sen. Stewart Fife contends it is "silly" that he is not exempt from committee work because of his work as Central Area Government president, and added that it is possible that he will simply use his presidential authority to reinstate himself.

EWC to resume counseling services

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Staff

Counseling services at the Everywoman's Center, officially discontinued in January, will resume April 18, according to Center director Carol Wallace.

Susan Mahler, a clinical social worker, has accepted the position of Counseling Services coordinator, Wallace said.

The center has lacked a permanent Counseling Services coordinator since last fall. A temporary replacement, Mercedes del Valle, was hired until someone could fill the full-time position. Del Valle left in January because her contract with the University expired.

Mahler will provide direct counseling and supervise a practicum counseling program staffed by graduate counseling students from a variety of schools nationwide, Wallace said.

The new coordinator will supervise support groups regarding such issues as eating disorders, lesbianism and divorce, Wallace said. She added that Mahler will assist community groups including the Eating Disorders Network, the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Mental Task Force and Adult Daughters of Alcoholics.

According to Wallace, many students who would normally have been counseled through the program were fielded to other offices like Mental Health.

"My guess is that in some cases, women went without counseling, either because they didn't want to go

Town and county elections today

• Students on ballot

Several University of Massachusetts students and faculty members, along with scores of other Amherst residents, will be on the ballot in today's town election for numerous town and county posts.

All registered voters in Amherst are eligible to vote in the election, which will be held between 7 a.m. and 8 p.m.

There are 10 precincts in Amherst. 24 people from each precinct are elected to represent the district at the Annual Town Meeting, held in late April or early May, and at special Town Meetings the Select Board may call at any time during the year.

Two vacancies on the Select Board will be filled in today's election. In addition, Amherst residents will elect two candidates to the Amherst School Committee, one to the Housing Authority, two to the Jones Library, two to the Redevelopment Authority and three to the County Commission. A moderator and an Oliver Smith Trustee will also be elected.

UMass students on the ballot include Nathan F. Moore, Kevin P. Rhines, Dan Costello, George Leaman, Matthew Domenic Benelli, Michael A. Greiner, Hilary J. Hirsch, Stuart J. Hurvitz, David S. Shulman, Melissa Silverstein, Steve Carson, Amer Syed, Peter B. Vaz, Milind Shashi Bharvirkar and Debra O'Connell.

Court denies injured athlete's appeal

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts Supreme Court, apparently upholding the innate violence of sport, rejected an appeal yesterday by a Worcester State hockey player who sued an opponent for leveling a penalty blow that cost him his spleen.

"Players, when they engage in sport, agree to undergo some physical contacts which could amount to assault and battery absent the players' consent," the justices said in a unanimous decision.

"Some of the restraints of civilization must accompany every athlete onto the playing field," the justices said in quoting an earlier opinion. But they continued that "the courts are wary of imposing wide tort liability on sports participants, lest the law chill the vigor of athletic competition."

Robert J. Gauvin sued Richard Clark after being injured in a Jan. 30, 1980, hockey game between Worcester State College of Worcester and Nichols College of Dudley.

Gauvin, a center for Worcester State, and Clark, a center for Nichols, had just been involved in a face-off when Clark delivered a "butt-ended" blow with the back of his stick to Gauvin's abdomen as the puck slid down the ice toward the Nichols goal.

As a result of the blow, the court said, Gauvin was hospitalized and underwent surgery. His spleen was removed and he missed seven weeks of school. Gauvin still suffers from bladder and abdominal pain, the court said.

A lower court jury rendered a special verdict on six specific questions in the case. The panel found that Clark had butt-ended Gauvin. The jury determined it was a hockey safety rule violation and that it caused Gauvin's injuries.

The panel also found that "by playing hockey, Gauvin did not consent to the act which caused his injury," and it awarded Gauvin $30,000 in damages.

Chemical weapon use addressed

Dozens of nations worldwide may be developing the capabilities to wage chemical warfare, according to findings at the recent Paris Conference on the prohibition of chemical weapons.

Conference members have called for the identification of nations developing chemical warfare capabilites, measures to control the proliferation of chemical arms and eventual insurance that chemical weapons are banned entirely.

Gordon Burck and Charles Flowerree, members of the Federation of American Scientists, attempted to address these concerns recently during an informal conference at the University of Massachusetts.

"The different evidence gives different people different conclusions," Burck said.

According to data published by the Federation, only the United States and the Soviet Union have admitted to possessing chemical warfare weapons.

However, a Congressional staff analyst reported last November that 40 countries were involved in chemical weapons, Burck said.

The data was based on evidence that some consider circumstantial, Burck said.

The problem with establishing which countries possess chemical warfare capabilities lies in the fact that the three main indicators of these capabilities — open admissions by the country involved, visible physical evidence and open international investigating — are rarely presented, he said.

Other types of evidence, including opinions from journalists and analysts and reports from intelligence agencies, are far less reliable, he said.

Burck said problems also lie in the definition of chemical warfare capabilities.

"Chemical warfare capability can mean much less or much more than simply possessing chemical agents," he said. "A chemical warfare capability, in the sense of being able to fight on a chemical battlefield, can exist without having offensive components."

"The dominant Western image of chemical warfare concerns a World War Three in Europe — chemicals plus Red Storm Rising," he said. "In several key respects, it's not applicable since war is taking place in several less-developed countries."

But Burck said in spite of difficulties truly comprehending who is in the chemical warfare club, the potential for production of chemical warfare agents is spreading.

In response to that, many nations are attempting to create legal and political remedies, he said.

Tomorrow, a look at remedies proposed by the Paris Conference and their implications.

Activist recalls Soviet trip

By DARREN GARNICK

Though people are still followed, bags are still searched and letters are still opened, Soviet dissidents are cautiously optimistic about glasnost, a Soviet Jewry activist said recently.

Susan Day, a Hillel administrator at Boston University, said one of the effects of her recent visit to the Soviet Union was an exchange of information.

Issues of Time, Newsweek, the Sunday New York Times and The Economist were not confiscated, she said, adding that in spite of hassles from customs officials, literature on Israel printed in Russian was allowed through as well. Similar attempts to bring Western news magazines into the country have traditionally failed, Day said.

Day brought back booklets distributed free at Soviet airports containing the Kremlin's version of the Arab-Israeli conflict. A photo caption in one of the books reads: "Anwar Sadat, Jimmy Carter and Menachem Begin at Camp David. The agreement signed by them became a prologue to a new Israeli aggression — this time against Lebanon."

"I obviously missed that part of the agreement," Day said. A Soviet map of the Middle East, which Day bought at Moscow's only bookstore, draws Israel's borders according to the 1947 U.N. partition plan.

Day said that in 1989, Soviet Jews are not the victims of the physical oppression they suffered a few years ago. Jewish emigration figures under Gorbachev are at the highest since the late 1970s, but Day said there is cautious optimism among those families she spoke with who wish to emigrate.

"[They] feel that they have to get out now while they have the chance," she said.

Day said the KGB still makes its omnipresent nature known. The key ladies in her hotel and her tour guides were "bureaucratic KGB," writing reports on her whereabouts, she said.

One of Day's students, "famous for getting lost," went out on her own with a video camera to get footage of Red Square and empty clothes racks in a department store. She returned six hours later. According to Day, a KGB man tailed the student home, "trapped" her in the hotel elevator and "grilled her with questioning."

Human rights activist Yuri Seminovsky, a veteran of over 60 arrests and three hunger strikes, told Day, "We do have some glasnost, but it is not for the average person. It is glasnost for politicians, journalists and for the West."

"Only after five or 10 years, if there still is openness, will it affect the average person," he told her.

Grad student to paint mural

Graduate art student Jonathan Kohrman will paint a new mural, commemorating Hands Across UMass.

A University of Massachusetts graduate student was recently selected to paint a mural commemorating last semester's Civility Week and Hands Across UMass.

Jonathan Kohrman, a graduate student in painting, will complete the mural later this year. The work will be mounted on the concrete wall outside the Campus Center Concourse's north exit, and is scheduled to be on view for 10 years, according to Marjorie Tuddle, program director for the UMass Arts Council.

The mural's purpose, beyond commemorating the week, is to "create a permanent message to speak to the issue of civility awareness on campus," Tuddle said.

Kohrman was selected from a pool of nine applicants in a competition held early this semester among Afro-American, art, and landscape architecture students, Tuddle said.

The selection was made by a jury, including Tuddle, three faculty members and a Physical Plant architect. An advisory board, consisting of students from the Third World Caucus and various administrative representatives, offered input on selections and on how civility might better be addressed in the works, Tuddle said.

Kohrmann refused to comment on his work, opting for a discussion tentatively scheduled for later this month.

ing to get customers? Most of our business comes from college students; they can't afford to take on the burden," DiCarlo said. "We don't have a well that we can pull funds out of."

Chick Delano, owner of the downtown Delano's, proposed a freeze on Amherst license fees "until surrounding cities and towns catch up with Amherst."

Washburn said the fees in Amherst are the highest in western Massachusetts, and the third highest in the state.

"Boston pays less than we do, and they have a 2 a.m. license. They [the Select Board] are singling out our industry," he said.

"We are not singling out any one group. Other fees are going up," said Selectwoman Elisa Campbell. "It's certainly not our intention to single you out."

Washburn said Amherst prices are the cheapest in the state.

"They get $2.75 for a beer in Boston. If the proposal is passed, we'll start doing the same," Washburn said.

"The real questions for the us are what fees do we actually have control over? Those are few in number, and the sin taxes are one of the few," said Selectman Minear.

Select Board members said they would look further into the issue, before voting at a later meeting.

elsewhere or they didn't have the resources to do so," Wallace said.

Between October 1987 and September 1988, the EWC provided counseling for 1,178 women, the majority of whom were students, according to Wallace. She added that this number does not include women who were referred to other agencies.

For six years, Mahler was director of a New York counseling program of crisis intervention and short-term counseling for adult and child victims of domestic violence and sexual abuse. For the past year, she has been a director of Brightside, a counseling center.

She received her bachelor of science degree from Hunter College, and her master's in social work from the State University of New York at Stonybrook.

Community groups offer internships for students

Students interested in teaching an adult to read, finding homes for single homeless parents or being a companion for a child can meet with representatives from three area organizations at 3:30 p.m. today in the Campus Center.

Representatives from Jessie's House, the Amherst Resource Center and community literacy projects have been brought to campus by the University of Massachusetts Internship Program, according to Ellen Wolf, the program's director.

"These programs give students the chance to immediately help with social problems that affect all communities," Wolf said.

Wolf said interested students can meet with internship advisors and can potentially receive as many as 15 credits for their work.

"It's an opportunity to make a difference," she said. "Our education is wasted unless we share it."

Helen McCarthy, a UMass student involved with Greenfield's Adult Literacy Program, agreed that education is important to share.

"These projects are a process of self-discovery, especially in what you are as a learner," she said. "It is a long struggle for the community, and student involvement in these projects is a great part of the answer."

The 21 senators who were able to submit applications yesterday will provide a much needed boost to the SGA's productivity, Dunlap said. "It's going to help them along fantastically. They're always understaffed," he said.

The expulsions are part of a continuing series of reforms designed to make the senate more efficient, including several motions on the agenda to reduce the size of the senate by more than half, Dunlap said.

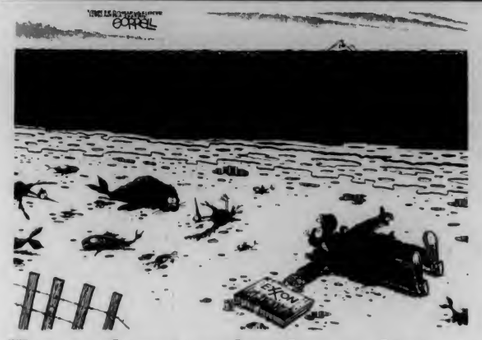
EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions in this page are the views of the author and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University. Letters welcomed.



To understand others, listen

In 1982, Tom Peters co-authored In Search of Excellence, a bestseller that said LISTENING distinguished the IBM's of the world from drab, run-of-the-mill, slow-growth corporations. In 1985 he was back with a different co-author in A Passion for Excellence (another bestseller), beating critics over the head with the idea that companies need to LISTEN to customers, low-level employees and anyone else with ideas or criticisms.

Rusty Denton

Somehow, it didn't surprise me to learn that a lack of listening may be the biggest problem in American business. Listening is like personal generosity to the poor: it's such an easy thing to do, everybody gives it lipservice, and yet hardly anyone actually does it. So why should national corporations, with their thousands of self-absorbed people, be any better at listening than any one of their individual workers?

People at universities tend to be pretty smug about the faults of the business world, perhaps especially about its unwillingness to listen to new ideas, but things aren't any better on campus. Last week, for instance, Phyllis Schlafly and Judy Goldsmith honored UMass by coming to debate the abortion issue. It could have been a noteworthy event, but the speakers were only given twenty minutes apiece to state their cases and rebut each other (hardly enough time for them to listen to one another). That was followed by 45 minutes of questions from members of the audience, most of whom were less interested in listening to our eminent guests than in making public statements themselves.

Worse yet, it was not the philosophical or moral ideas that dominated the evening, it was innuendos and accusations (from both sides) about who didn't care about women and children. What a bogus issue! It's name-calling; it doesn't prove anything. Besides that, pro-lifers ought to be willing to concede that most pro-choicers genuinely care about pregnant women; respect for life includes courtesy to political opponents.

And pro-choice accusers are on equally shaky ground. Seated in the auditorium that night were many pro-lifers who have amply manifested compassion. I myself in the last couple of years have given several thousand dollars to the local poor, given away several pieces of solid furniture and piles of good clothes, sheltered a homeless man, undertaken assistance of a single mother, lent out my one working car (the other is often disfunct) for months at a time, and devoted nights and weekends to serving others, even though as a grad student I have a full schedule and don't make megabucks. The issue is not compassion.

I believe people on both sides resort to the compassion argument when they don't want to sort out the sticky questions of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness that haunt the abortion debate. In other words, it's easier to accuse than to listen to one another, easier than responding thoughtfully.

Contrast that with the Lincoln-Douglas campaign debates on secession, racism and slavery — issues that probed the foundations of law and human dignity in their time as much as abortion does today. Their public dialogues include some of the most compelling speeches and most incisive logic in history. Why? Because they listened and meditated at length upon each other's points and responded accordingly. They talked to each other, not at each other.

I think that's a prerequisite for changing history. It's a prerequisite for fulfilling relationships and prosperous businesses. It's a prerequisite for compassion. If you say you care about those things, are you listening?

The stress of spring fever

The following is a sample of an authentic diary kept by a professional student procrastinator. It was found among the student's personal belongings left in a dormitory at UMass after the 1988 spring semester. The student, who no longer attends this learning institution, was afflicted with an incurable case of spring fever.

Jon Bowzer

Monday, May 2; Sunny out, no chance of rain. I can't decide whether to blow off classes or work. . .I hate indecision so, after a little thought, I blew them both off. Will have to get the notes from a classmate on Wednesday. Remembered while playing Hacky Sack that I have a Spanish quiz tomorrow. Will definitely study after dinner. . . .Dinner was gross so I had to get some fresh air after eating. I learned a new way to kick the Hackey Sack today!

Tuesday May 3: Rough day today. I wish school was already out. Couldn't find my Spanish book last night, so I went upstairs to study with We watched Letterman and prayed the quiz would be true or false because 's Spanish book is holding up his roommate's stereo. . . .The quiz was oral. My Professor informed me that my average was beyond help and that if Spanish was my major I should switch. I was so hurt that I blew off my stats lecture.

Wednesday May 4: Just found out that I have an anthropology exam on Thursday and a ten-page paper due for English on Friday. I never get a break. After classes I started studying for anthropology, but the sun was in my eyes. Had to move out on the Pyramids to study with my back to the sun. Finished half a chapter before my friends dragged me into a frisbee game. Finally caught the frisbee between my legs — must write home! Started to study anthropology at 7 p.m. At 7:15, I realized that I had no clean underwear. I had to do my wash but I'm out of quarters. . . . Nobody on my floor has quarters. . . Nobody for ten floors above me has change, I must go to Munchy's. . . .I just returned form Munchy's with change but Letterman is starting, I can't believe that it's already 12:30 and I've only read six paragraphs of anthropology. Stupid pet tricks are on, how can I skip that? Maybe the exam will be easy. . .PS – dinner was worse.

Thursday, May 5: I don't think I belong in school. The exam wasn't fair. He'll have to scale that baby fer sure. I'll write my English paper after the Cosby Show. Maybe if I go to dinner right after Cheers, I'll get an outline done before the Dating Game. . . Couldn't eat dinner so I hitchhiked to McDonald's. The cashier had the worst case of acne I've ever seen. (Later that night.) Just as L.A. Law was starting, came into my room with wine coolers. Boy was I thirsty! Everyone on my floor is going to a party in Hobart Lane. I can't go. My mind is made up, my priorities are set.

Friday May 6: I guess I'll have to turn my paper in late. If I can get it done this weekend I'll only lose one full grade. That's a solid B – no problem. After Hobart Lane, I woke up with a killer hangover, so I had to blow off class to sleep it off in the sun. My tan is the best one on my floor; can't wait to hit the beach. . . Dad called and asked me why I wasn't in class. I told him that I was on my way to the library. He believed it! I think if I stay in tonight, I can have my paper done and typed by Saturday afternoon. Still, I wonder if anyone on the floor had the same assignment last year. . . No one did. . . .Maybe I can find someone to sell me their paper tonight at Brandywine. I won't even have a drink until I find a paper. School is first.

Sunday May 8: I slept through Saturday and still haven't started my stupid paper. I found out that my professor changes paper topics every semester. That slimebag! I can't believe I have to waste such a beautiful day to write a stupid paper. It's 80 degrees outside and everyone is blasting Guns and Roses on their stereos. How can I possibly write a paper under these conditions? I might as well do it tonight after dinner. Besides, I never got any fresh air yesterday. . . Dinner was horrid.

Parody issue offends Muslims

In the April Fool's edition of the Collegian, an article ("Collegian editor abducted, executed by Muslims," March 31) was unfortunately printed. It was an article that displayed extremely bad taste. I found it to be such an insensitive and offensive article, that for a moment, I thought I was reading the Minuteman, not the Collegian. Will we now have to ban the Collegian too?

The article portrayed Muslims as terrorists; fanatics blindly following the will of the Ayatollah. It was deeply embedded with the violence and terrorism that is unmistakenly associated with Muslims. Clearly, the article is structured around stereotypical attitudes towards Muslims.

How could the Collegian editorial staff allow such garbage to be printed? April Fool's Day . . . humor? . . . is not an excuse to print such a callous article. If there is anything the article does demonstrate, it is the ignorance of the writers.

Such insensitivity should not go unobserved. Whoever wrote this article does not deserve the postition of a journalist. A University paper must represent the entire population of students. It must be sensitive to the various ethnic groups at UMass. Such articles demonstrate that lack of sensitivity.

Abortion fight should not end in the Supreme Court

[I guess I really wasn't as informed as I thought I was, because I incorrectly identified 7-Up as being owned by the Coca-Cola company in last week's column. I'm not that thirsty.]

On Sunday, thousands of abortion rights advocates will participate in a march on Washington DC to try to persuade the Supreme Court not to overturn Roe vs Wade, the Supreme Court case that made abortion legal in the United States.

The Supreme Court has consented to review a Missouri court case that could be crucial in the legality of abortions in this country. But is the Supreme Court the best place to go when abortion rights are threatened?

A political science professor made a thought-provoking comment a few weeks ago. He said that considering the fact that the justices sitting on the Supreme Court bench are predominately conservative (abortion foes), would such a "liberal" thing as a march with thousands of people really convince them of anything?

The people on the Supreme Court are there for life. They don't have to answer to the American citizens. We have no power to remove them. I'm sure that in making their decisions, the justices take the climate of the country into consideration when rendering a decision, but there is no source of pressure or demand there.

This professor suggested that we should, instead, place our focus upon the legislature and law enforcement agencies. After all, a law can be passed, can be on the books for years, but if it's not enforced, it means nothing.

If the Supreme Court leaves the abortion decision up to the states, the state legislatures are the places to be applying the pressure. They represent us and have to listen to us. If most of a state's citizens do not believe in making abortion illegal, legislators would jeopardize their political careers by making it illegal.

Meredith O'Brien

The general opinion in this country is that abortion should be a woman's choice. Despite loud, powerful groups like Operation Rescue, most Americans are not yet ready to give the right to an abortion up to a group of politicians and bureaucrats.

Dozens of surveys have been conducted and analyzed to death trying to determine exactly what percentage of Americans would want abortions outlawed.

Out of the 1,002 people the Boston Globe and WBZ-TV surveyed, 53 percent believed that abortion should be legal in some circumstances; such as rape, incest or life-threatening to the mother. 25 percent of the respondents believed that abortion should be legal in all circumstances. Only 19 said that all abortions should be made illegal.

The Los Angeles Times conducted a poll asking, "Do you agree or disagree with this statement? 'I personally feel that abortion is morally wrong, but I also feel that abortion is a decision that has to be made by every woman herself.'." 71 percent of the people agreed with this statement.

On April 2, a Boston Globe article said, "A majority of states are expected to ban abortion in all but extreme circumstances and half a dozen would prohibit it altogether if the US Supreme Court returns the power to regulate the procedure to the states."

That's not very encouraging, but if the Supreme Court rules that abortion is illegal, there's not much that we can do to them. But what we can do is put immense pressure on the state legislatures. Even if the majority of people in the Massachusetts House of Representatives are anti-abortion as the Globe article claims, they are still representing a liberal state that is pro-choice. They may be popularly elected, but they should be aware of their constituency. Voters would remember the politicians who made abortion illegal when they go to the polling booth.

Don't get me wrong, I sincerely hope that Sunday's march does get its point across to the justices. But I'm more concerned with convincing our state legislature.

Junkie's musical choices to kill your mom by

By JON DRUKMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Abruptly the neon colored citrus fruits circling my head in a low orbit melted away. I had just read Thomson's (that's Mr. Thomson to you - Ed.) latest attack on my humble reviewer ways and I was chuckling over his naivete while washing down the Cap'n Crunchberries. In honor of his Royal Englishness I dropped all the British bands from my roster of things to review and decided to go after the greater European continent. Who is he calling a commie anyway? I had my staff of ex-CIA thugs run a quick background check and discovered that he used to be known as Comrade Thomson (actually it was Domaishdov - Ed.) and his so-called English blue blood runs redder than the tide in Boston harbor midsummer! Besides his anagram of my last name was completely off base. Which leads me to note that THOMSON spelled sideways is SNOTHOM and we all know what that means (actually I looked it up in J.J Smith's dictionary of Old Icelandic lexography Jon, and it said omnipotent or Godlike figure, object of worship - Ed.). Anyway if you rearrange my name properly you get MANDURK which is Swahili for Dangerous Assassin. This is, not surprisingly, a great lead in to today's first group.

The first non-English band is called My Life with the Thrill Kill Kult and their first full-length album is entitled I See Good Spirits and I See Bad Spirits. There is very little info about the band inside, but that sort of trivia pales into minimal significance when confronted with a work of this magnitude. It opens quietly with some intricate percussion and mellow synthesizer leads conjuring up images of a storm brewing. And brew it does, because the quiet tone soon vanishes in a hail of crashing industrial percussion and Ma-Ma-Ma-Max Headroom style vocal snippets, overe which the Kult members sing lyrics that mainly deal with simple "boy meets girl; boy lures girl into dangerous cult group; boy dismembers girl on the Holy Altar of the Space god Zweebo" themes.

Musically the group belong to the Skinny Puppy school of sonic assault, although there are some hypnotic and trancelike sections which break up the intensity. Song titles like "Heresy," "Do You Fear For Your Child?" and "Gateway to Hell" should give you an idea of what this band is all about. This is great stuff to listen to late at night with all the lights off and tons of Crunchberries running through your circulatory system.

Our musical Travelogue takes us next to Switzerland, and the latest album from Yello, it's called Flag and it continues the duo's tradition of creating complex musical soundscapes, which sometimes take the form of pop tunes, but often tend to wander around, painting the aural platform with broad brushstrokes. The phrase "richly layered" springs to mind as track upon track of hyperkinetic latin percussiion mixes with synthesizers and the occasional guitar, while vocalist Dieter Meier, his voice ranging from a high whisper to a booming subsonic bass, speaks or sings oblique lyrics.

Although intelligibiliity is not one of the high points (lyric sheet not included), the words are as integral to the atmosphere as the music, conveying a mood rather than a direct message. There's nothing else like it in music today. So, if you've got forty miinutes or so to kill, put on Flag, close your eyes and prepare for an aural trip of breathtaking range.

Deep sea anti-thriller drowns itself in hopeless cliches

Leviathan
Hampshire Six Theaters

This spring break I went skiing and sat through the horror film Leviathan. Both the slopes and the movie were downhill from the start. For fans of the recent underwater dog Deepstar Six (all three of you), you will probably enjoy Leviathan.

FILM REVIEW

The plot is the old monster-picks-off-entire-cast-except-protagonist-and-his-main squeeze. I was shocked to see a third party at the ridiculous conclusion of the film, but he was taken care of by the monster-isn't-dead-yet cliche.

Miners are extracting silver on the bottom of the ocean when a sunken ship is discovered. The ship, Leviathan, (translated roughly into Latin equals "badius movius"), is a Russian (surprise!) vessel that was involved with genetic altering experiments. After two miners drink some contaminated vodka, they develop the ultimate hangover and, hey, here's a new cinematic twist, an alien bursts out of their chests! The slime quotient in the film is quite high and the only reason the picture rates higher than Deepstar Six is the producers had a few more bucks to spend on the special effects.

Peter Weller tries his hardest as the captain, who is quite tan for spending nine months in an underwater lab. Amanda Pays is his main squeeze, though the only interaction they have together is a throwaway five minute scene that these type of movies use to try to develop characters, usually with laughable results. In this trite bit of exposition, Pays, in her tight jogging suit, keeps asking Weller, "Why are you here?"(Well, believe me Amanda, I was asking the same question.) Richard Crenna is also on hand as the ship's doctor who continually acts strange for some muddled reason the filmmakers forget to explain.

The film borrows more from Alien and its sequel than chest-bursting and a claustrophobic setting. The crew members are identical, a greedy company owner threatens the safety of the crew (a la Paul Reiser as the sleazy Burke in Aliens) and the film even has the ominous computer voice droning " . . . the ship will explode in four minutes" toward the conclusion.

There are a few tense moments. One has Pays and Weller scrambling toward a closing door as their walkway collapses. Director George P. Cosmatos uses quick cuts quite effectively to mount tension in this and a few other scenes. Unfortunately, he also relies heavily on the tired fake-scare syndrom, where characters bump into each other for no other reason than to give the audience a cheap scare. This manipulative shock tactic has been beaten to death in horror films ever since John Carpenter's effective Halloween was released over a decade ago.

I will probably hold the dubious distinction of seeing all of the year's underwater thrillers, with James Cameron's The Abyss due out soon. (Bad luck does come in threes doesn't it?) But as Big last year and the recent Chances Are proved, both being in a long line of body-switching comedies, if a tired story is handled correctly the results can be splendid. I hope Cameron fares better than Cosmatos did in Leviathan, which belongs in the Davy Jones locker of stupid thrillers.

Beauty plus comfort equals chair for modern designers

Hampden Gallery will present "Chair as Hero: An Exhibition of Twentieth Century Chairs" from April 6 through April 25. This exhibit will feature benchmark designs of this century's most celebrated designers as well as new local talent. An opening reception is scheduled for Sunday, April 9, from 2 to 5 p.m. featuring a lecture on Twentieth Centutry chair design by Chris Kennedy of American decorative arts at 4 p.m.

The chair is an integral part of every household and place of business. The chairs for this exhibit have been chosen for three important reasons: their bold iconography, the radical technical advances in the use of materials, and their design endurance. By way of this exhibit, one will be able to decide if form as well as function lend a chair its "beauty" or if it is simply a matter of comfort. Designer Philip Johnson seems to believe the two concepts are integral: "I think that comfort is a function of whether you think a chair is good-looking or not."

American Art songs will be the subject of lyric tenor Paul Sperry's master class on Tuesday, April 4 from 12:.5 to 2:15 p.m. in Bezanson Recital Hall. Sponsored by Opera Workshop, this event is free and open to the public.

Paul Sperry is unique among American singers in his dedication to preserving the art song form.

Deluxe blues and more from Chicago's lucky one

Lucky Strikes!
Lucky Peterson
Alligator Records

Somewhere along the line it has to happen. One of these days Alligator is going to come up short, and all of us hungry blues hounds are gonna be stuck with a real dud of an album. But until that fateful day arrives, just sit tight, 'cause Bruce Iglauer and the gang from the windy city keep pumping out the vinyl, and Lucky Peterson's Alligator debut, Lucky Strikes, is another winner.

RECORD REVIEW

Twenty-six year old Lucky Peterson is an accomplished multi-instrumentalist/vocalist, and this release marks his official arrival on the national blues scene. With compositions similar in style to the be-bop shuffles of Clarence Gatemouth Brown, and a strong voice that flashes of a young B.B. King, Peterson touches traditional blues bases, but more importantly, expands his reach, and pokes his nose around assorted jazz and funk-like disciplines.

The title track is a forum for Peterson's elegantly dextrous keyboard noodling. Noticeably advanced well beyond most of his contemporaries (save for labelmate and blues dinosaur Charles Brown . . . maybe), he's backed the likes of Lightnin' Hopkins and Jimmy Reed, and done loads of session work at Alligator's main tool-shed, Florida's King Snake Records. Peterson's tight dixie shuffles are right from the delta, yet he's equally comfortable with punching out fusion-like ramblings and walls of sound more remniscent of a John Lord, or a (dare I say it?) John Paul Jones.

(Somewhere, somebody's offended by that statement.) Moving on, Peterson plays nearly all the lead guitar on Lucky Strikes!. His vocabulary of licks strikes a nice balance between stuff pulled from the standard Chicago dictionary, and his own somewhat unique approach (that of a piano player who picked up a guitar). He does nothing really amazing, but certainly capable nonetheless, besides, blues guitar isn't supposed to be amazing, it's supposed to be good.

"Heart Attack" has a pleasant touch of early to mid 70's funk. Sylvester Polk (trumpet) and Bill Samuel (tenor and baritone sax) create thick horn lines that balance well with the backing vocals (Vyki Walls, Nadine Brown and Donna Staples).

"The blues ain't nothing but a good man feelin' bad." Son House? No, Joe Seneca opposite Ralph Macchio in Crossroads. Good enough. "Over My Head" is Peterson's stab at sounding off straight from the heart. Feeling bad or not, he sounds it, and his righteous howls are both seething, and soothing.

Alligator bills Lucky Strikes! as the springboard for Peterson's solo career. Makes sense. It's his first major release. In any case, it's a strong blues album, with some pleasant surprises. This label is on a roll . . . but I'm still waiting.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You are handsomely rewarded for your past efforts. Enjoy your time in the limelight even if all the attention gives you some qualms. New contracts will be signed, leading to a hefty bonus.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A new alliance will increase profits considerably. Guard your original ideas. Be careful who you show your work to. Consult loved ones before giving serious consideration to a major employment move.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You will get a lucky break if you move quickly. Career and vocational discussions are favored. You find new ways to further your secret agenda. Your personal prestige is on the rise.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Check into a new investment program – there are better ways to increase your income. Joint finances are in the spotlight. Your concentration is excellent today, enabling you to complete routine tasks quickly.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A telephone call reveals something exciting early today. Practicality is essential when making business choices. Get a complete rundown before making final decisions. A romance may be headed for the rocks. Look out!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Career and vocational discussions are favored. You find ingenious ways to further your aims. Friends begin to play a bigger role in your personal decisions. Count on romance to be exciting.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Your social plans could go awry today. Tackle those chores you have been postponing. Do everything you can to make a good impression on a new client. Romance holds several surprises.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Get your information firsthand, from someone close to the scene. If you exercise authority with tact, you will get the cooperation you need to put over an important deal. Postpone romance.

SAGITARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Play a hunch where business is concerned or you could be sorry later on. You will enjoy reversing roles with your partner for a change. Sign business agreements and renew contracts.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Changes at work will be to your advantage. Although parent-child relations are turbulent at times, you are likely to make the right choices. Your social plans could go awry. Be flexible.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Broken promises are upsetting, but could ultimately help you. Contact an influential person if you need "inside" information. Others seek your expertise. Ask for fair compensation.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A platonic relationship could suddenly turn romantic. If you are not ready for a commitment, make your feelings known immediately. Curtail unnecessary spending and a dream vacation could become a reality.

same blood bath we did, it hurt them."

OK, onward. Today the Minutewomen will plunge right into their Atlantic 10 schedule with a double date against the Rams of URI. Rhode Island brings to town a team that compares with the Minutewomen in its youth and aggressivness. For either team, in fact, a fast league start would stand as an important confidence builder through the weeks ahead.

The Rams have stumbled early, however, dropping a pair of close games to Adelphi on Sunday after being beaten badly by UConn the week before.

"This team is not in a position to take anyone lightly," said Sortino of her squad. "But if the 'D' holds true, we'll be fine."

■ Sox lose to Baltimore

Stanley, who received the loss, entered after Lee Smith left with a pulled groin. It was Boston's fourth straight defeat on opening day.

Boston's starting pitcher, Roger Clemens, 6-2 lifetime against the Orioles, left after Brady Anderson led off the eighth inning with his second double. He pitched seven innings, allowing seven hits and four runs, as he earned his second no-decision in two opening-day starts.

The Orioles set a major league record last year for futility — losing 21 games to start the season, so yesterday's victory helped eliminate this year's potential albatross.

"It was very important for the players out there," Baltimore skipper Frank Robinson said. "They're a young ballclub and they're relatively new to each other out there . . . it was a good win because now we can concentrate on things and not have to worry about, 'Uh oh, when are we going to win one in the 1989 season.'"

Cal Ripken's three-run homer in the sixth put Baltimore ahead 4-3. Anderson doubled, Phil Bradley walked and Ripken sent a 2-1 pitch over the left-field wall.

Boston tied the score with a run in the seventh when Jody Reed singled home Nick Esasky, who led off with a double and took third on a ground out by Rich Gedman.

Trailing 1-0, Boston scored three times in the sixth inning. Dwight Evan's RBI double tied the score and Greenwell hit a two-run homer off started Dave Schmidt.

against Yale. It's just being poised in front of goal. We have excellent players who have excellent shooting capability but it all comes down to poise, poise when the pressure is on."

The attack, with the exception of junior Sue Murphy could not hang on to the ball in last week's loss and many of its turnovers ended up as Bulldog fast breaks. Ball control could be a key to tomorrow's game.

"This is definitely a game that we can come out with a positive result," Bossio said. "Both teams are young so whoever makes the fewest mistakes is going to come out the victor."

UMass has not tasted victory for over two weeks. Their last win was an easy one over Hofstra University March 19.

Ap photo

President George Bush threw out the ceremonial first pitch at yesterday's Red Sox game in Baltimore.

The Orioles took a 1-0 lead in the fourth when Anderson walked, stole second and scored on a single by Joe Orsulak.

Baltimore rookie Steve Finley had to leave the game after the third inning after crashing into the wall in right-center field after making a catch on Esasky's drive. X-rays on Finley showed a sprained right shoulder.

Wade Boggs, a five-time American League batting champion, went 2-for-4.

Sports Notices

Women's soccer:

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team captured the UMass Indoor Tournament Sunday at Boyden Gym.

The Minutewomen captured their division by tying Athlete's Corner and beating Rhode Island and New Hampshire. In the semifinal, UMass beat Hartford 2-1 on goals by Sue Gaudette and Tracy Arwood, and then knocked off Keene State in the final, 1-0 on a goal by Gaudette.

Intramural baseball:

All University men interested in playing intramural baseball should attend a meeting on Wednesday, Apr. 4 in 249 Boyden from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m. There will be a $5 sign-up fee.

■ Baxter

Minutewomen pushed the school scoring mark up to 180.95 at the A-10's as well. All numbers concerned are expected to swell in the near future (aided by scoring reforms that will be made starting next season).

"We gained respect in the league, but we'd definitely like to crack that top three," said Mitchell, who sees next season's league tournament to be held at UMass as a good date to shoot for. Season's end also marked the loss of seniors Anne Ditunno, Kim Keefe, Lou Kaufman, Audry Roughgarden, Lisa Takorek, Deb Schiller and Assistant Coach Alisa Spector — all key contributors to the program both on and off the mats, according to Mitchell.

With their departure, Mitchell will lean on Baxter and returning classmates Enya Hlozik and Kristin Turmail — both of whom sat out this season with injuries. Much is also expected of incoming freshmen Abbey May and Lisa Beth Cronin, both of whom are from the local area, and New York state standout Tammy Marshall.

Marshall toured with the US National Team last summer, and has averaged around 37 all-around points through high school.

"The incoming freshmen can definitely take a spot," said Mitchell. "No one is assured of anything; the program is now moving in a direction where you really have to earn a spot."

All of which may come as a mixed blessing to returning underclassmen Grady, Erin Klier, Debbie Schultz, Elma Lagendyk and others.

Baseball season says "Play Ball"...

Baseball splits a pair for the second straight day

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — For the second day in a row, the University of Massachusetts baseball team began its day by beating St. Joseph's University in the first game of a doubleheader.

For the second day in a row, the Minutemen came away disappointed, losing a second game that they could have won.

UMass won the first game 4-0, but lost the second 5-2, to come away with a split of both the doubleheader and this weekend's rain-delayed four game series.

In the first game, Don Strange threw a complete game shutout to lead UMass, now 7-8 overall and 2-2 in the Atlantic 10 conference, to the win.

The junior righty struck out four and walked just one while allowing six hits.

"The split-finger is my best pitch," said Strange. "But I threw the fastball and slider also. I felt in control the whole way and it's always easier to pitch with a lead."

Strange's teammates gave him a lead in the very first inning. Dave Edwards walked, stole second, and scored on Drew Seccafico's single to make it 1-0.

The Minutemen made it 2-0 in the second when Steve Kern doubled off the left field fence, and eventually scored on Brian Donovan's infield hit.

Kern struck again in the fourth, smashing a Gil Howard delivery over the left field fence.

UMass got its final run in the fifth, when Donovan singled and scored on a base hit to right by Edwards.

St. Joe's threatened in the seventh, putting two men on, but Strange got Dave Leggieri to fly out and end the game.

In the second contest, UMass came back from a three-run deficit by scoring a pair in the sixth inning.

Then in the bottom of the sixth, UMass appeared to end a St. Joe's rally with an inning-ending double play. The umpire, however, called the runner safe at first, and Matt Ekker followed with a two run blast to give the Hawks some insurance.

St. Joe's scored a run in the first and added two more in the third to take its original lead.

But in the sixth, Edwards got things started for UMass with a single. Seccafico followed with a single to right, and Drew Comeau's base hit scored Edwards. Seccafico scored when Brian Bright grounded into a force play.

Red Sox lose opener to O's in the 11th, 5-4

BALTIMORE (AP)— The Baltimore Orioles, losers of their first 21 games last year, won their season opener Monday, beating the American League East champion Boston Red Sox 5-4 on Craig Worthington's 11th-inning single.

The rookie came through in the 11th after Mickey Tettleton walked and took third on Randy Milligan's hit-and-run single.

Boston reliever Mike Smithson replaced Bob Stanley in the to face Worthington in the 11th.

Boston manager Joe Morgan then called in Mike Greenwell from left field to give the Red Sox three fielders on the left side. Worthington's ensuing bloop fell just beyond the reach of Ellis Burks in center field.

"I thought it was going to be a short fly ball, but when I turned around, then I saw the alignment," Smithson said. "I saw Greeny come in before but I thought they were just talking about how they were going to play it."

"The alignment didn't make any difference. I was just looking for a ground ball. I got it in on his hands and he fought it off."

Brian Holton, acquired in an off-season trade that sent Eddie Murray to Los Angeles, pitched 4 1-3 scoreless innings for the victory. continued on page 11

Baxter slowed at Regionals

Her 33.6 is just off her season's average

By SAM SILVERSTEIN

Erika Baxter, the leading all-around scorer for the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team this season, rubbed elbows with the area's gymanstics elite this weekend during the Northeast Regional meet at Pennsylvania State University.

Baxter averaged 36.95 all-around points this winter to earn the invitation, but battled a touch of the flu — and a slight case of the stumbles on her floor exercise and balance beam routines — to post a 33.60 in Saturday's action.

"It was not my best performance. I'm a little disappointed," said Baxter, who is a junior. UMass coach Alfie Mitchell accompanied Baxter to the meet, and viewed the results optimisitically as just another step in her ascent to the region's top ranks.

"I think now she knows what to expect next time she's in that situation," he said confidently.

UMass freshman Kim Grady made the trip as an alternate, but did not compete.

And thus came to a close the first winter of Mitchell's reign atop the UMass program. Led by the efforts of Baxter and an infusion of freshman talent, the Minutewomen rewrote the school scoring mark twice and brushed up against a team bid to the Regional meet.

"I was really satisfied, I couldn't ask for anything more," said Mitchell.

As a team, UMass chinned up to the fourth slot in the Atlantic 10 tournament, and finished with a 7-4 record. The continued on page 11

Rugby wins a pair at home

The University of Massachusetts rugby team won both of its games this past Saturday despite the cold and muddy conditions. The Minutemen got on the board early in the first game against the University of Rhode Island as Jeff Burrill carried the first try [roughly equivalent to a touchdown but worth four points] of the game in off a lateral pass by Gary Williams.

Bruce Harrington followed up Burrill's score with one of his own and Eric Olsen finished off the scoring for UMass. URI roared back late in the second with trys by Kevin Gallager and Greg Shulman. URI had a golden opportunity to win the game on a last second kick of about 15 yards, but the URI player shanked his kick and the game was officially over. The final score was 12-10.

In the game against Maine, UMass scored at the 20-minute mark of the second half on a try from Bob Carney. The captain of the Minuteman squad, Kevin Turner, added the final try of the game to put the final score at 8-0.

The rugby team travels to West Point for next Saturday's game against Army.

Softball gets set for URI

By SAM SILVERSTEIN

Not that they are short-sighted or anything, it's just that the University of Massachusetts softball team (5-10) has not yet finished savoring Sunday's dismantling of two of the top teams in the Northeast; Princeton and the University of Connecticut.

"We've got a lot of stuff left to do," cautioned UMass coach Elaine Sortino, "but they were tremendous wins for us. ... I'm going to ride this right up until the first pitch (today vs. the University of Rhode Island at Totman field, 3pm)."

So that while the rains yesterday forced yet another indoor practice, and injuries continued to chase Holly Aprile, Chris Collins and Alison Foreman, the mood yesterday in the softball corner of the Boyden bigtop was boyant.

"It's a very young day and we grow every day, but you could see the poise yesterday. ... all that stuff goes back to the way we suffered in California," continued Sortino. "We had to grow up. Princeton and Connecticut, having not worked through the continued on page 11

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is on one streak that the Gazelles would rather not talk about.

UMass has lost three games in a row, including a 17-7 loss in its home opener to Yale University last Wednesday. Patti Bossio's crew is at 1-3 on the year but now is no time to panic.

The Gazelles will have to keep their cool tonight when they take on Doug Flutie's old school (That's Boston College for all three of you that have never heard of the miracle man).

This will be the first and only time that the Gazelles will get to play a game under the lights this season. UMass will head to Chestnut Hill tonight for a 7 p.m. game on the Eagles' home carpet.

Maybe the Gazelle offense, which hit the strands of the Yale net just seven times last week in its home dayview, will be a little more awake in the later hour.

"We have to take advantage of our opportunities," Bossio said. "We had 27 shots continued on page 11

BDIC finds it 'homey' at UMass

Diversity appeals to students

By LYNDA SEGAL
Collegian Staff

Damian Raskill did not enjoy his major at the University of Massachusetts. He said he found engineering did not prepare him for any of his long range goals.

After much searching, he encountered the Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration program.

As a sophomore, Julie Clark enrolled in the BDIC program. She was led to the program after trying a variety of other majors. Concentrating in advertising and copywriting, Clark now feels confident that she is getting the best background for her particular career goals.

Raskill and Clark are just two examples of students who have found a new freedom in the BDIC major.

"I am really pleased with the program's flexibility in allowing you to do what you want with your concentration," she said.

Beginning in 1970 as a pilot program, BDIC has grown to about 150 students. The first official degree was received in 1972, and present-day majors such as Legal Studies, Environmental Sciences, and Women's Studies are an outgrowth of the original program, according to Susan Perschetz Malchala, coordinator of BDIC.

Each BDIC student is guided through their program by a faculty sponsor. Perschetz Malchala said. Seven peer advisors, older BDIC majors oriented in counseling are also available to the students, she said.

"The BDIC faculty gives students a sense of home," she said. "We attempt to give students a sense of a place that they are cared about and they're not just a number."

The 1970s were a period of change and growth, she said, adding that people were interested in finding something fresh and unique.

When BDIC began, Perschetz Malchala said, students were concentrating in business and technical areas. The 1980s have given rise to more diverse student concentrations, she said, as well as an increase in humanistic and science-related areas.

And, although student concentrations have become more diverse, the size of the program has remained static over the years, Perschetz Malchala said. Except for an occasional upsurge at the end of the semester rush for scheduling, she said.

"We are content with the size that BDIC is, and the continued on page 10

Pro-choice dominates rally

People for Choice urge to keep abortion legal

By KATERI WALSH
Collegian Correspondent

In yesterday's Rally for Women's Equality and Women's Lives, abortion emerged as the domingnt topic when speakers said women should have the right to choose abortion.

On the Student Union steps and under overcast skies, more than 200 people huddled under umbrellas chanting, "Not the church, not the state, women must decide their fate," and "No more apathy, no more lies, women must reclaim their lives."

Deb Watson of People for Choice said, "Abortion is not an act of cruelty. Abortion, as defined by me and a majority of men and women in this country, is an act of love and kindness." People for Choice is a pro-choice organization at UMass.

The noon-time rally was intended to focus on many issues important to women, according to organizer Leah Callahan, vice-president of the University of Massachusetts chapter of the National Organization for Women. The rally was also to call attention to the April 9 march in Washington, D.C., she added.

More than 400 UMass students are expected to attend the rally at the nation's capital to lobby for the Equal Rights Amendment and to keep abortion legal.

Callahan said a majority of Americans oppose overturning Roe vs. Wade, a Supreme Court ruling that made abortion legal in 1973. She also said the March 31 Boston Globe article "Most in US favor ban on majority of abortions, poll finds" contained misused statistics.

Marcy Lew, also of People for Choice, said George Bush's call for a kinder, gentler nation contradicts his call for making abortion illegal.

Jason Rabinowitz, chairman of the Young Communist League, said abortions would continue to take place even if the Supreme Court overturns Roe vs. Wade.

"For the rich, they will take place at a higher price," Rabinowitz said. "For the poor, they will take place in a back alley at the hands of butchers."

Arlene Avakian, a professor in the UMass women's studies department who turned 50 yesterday, said she became pregnant in 1961. She said she was shattered by the news, and she lacked options because abortion was then illegal.

"I can't think of a better way to spend my birthday then to say no, no to what I had to go through in dealing with an unwanted pregnancy," she said.

Spectators signed petitions to uphold the right to have an abortion and to legalize the use of a pill that would cause an abortion [which is now being used in France but not yet available in the US].

Ann Ferguson, a professor in the women's studies department who began and ended the rally with singing, said she had an illegal abortion as a teenager. "I do not want my daughter to have to go through that. I don't want anyone to have to go through that," she said.

There were no organized pro-life groups at yesterday's rally.

Proposed fee increases get final vote from Trustees

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

A proposed increase in the mandatory fees of $51 for undergraduate and $34 for graduate students will go before the University of Massachusetts' Board of Trustees tomorrow for a final vote, said acting Budget Director Joyce Hatch.

Increases of $107 for room and $83 for board will be brought before the Trustees tomorrow for approval. The board will also decide whether or not to reinstate $230 in curriculum fees instituted last year to offset budget cuts, Hatch said.

The curriculum fee, if approved, will not be charged to graduate students, Hatch said, bringing their total mandatory fees for the coming year to $662.

If all the fee increases are approved by the Trustees, undergraduates will be paying a total of $1,065 in mandatory fees, $1,621 for room and $1,363 for board next year, according to figures released by Hatch's office.

The largest increase of $22 will be for the athletic fee bringing next year's assessment to $134, according to Hatch's office.

Hatch said the fees are not a result of the budget crisis UMass is currently facing but a yearly review by trust fund directors who control each account.

The directors are hiking fees in reaction to inflation, salary increases and an expected drop of 250 in the student population, Hatch said.

Though some of the increases in fees are due to fewer students, this only accounts for about $1 to $2 of the total — the majority of the increases are due to inflation, she said.

"The rest [of the fees] would be going up anyway because of inflation," she said.

Hatch said the dinning and housing directors did not even take into account fewer students when figuring their increases for next year.

Of the 18 fees which are not mandatory, the administration is looking for increases in six, including a $100 increase in engineering fees bringing the total to $300 per year and a $3 increase of the undergraduate commencement fee, bringing that total from $33 to $36, also according to figures released by Hatch's office.

Man accused of bogus bomb threat

GRETNA, La. (AP) — A Massachusetts concert promoter accused of telling a United Airline representative that he had checked a bomb onto an airplane was held yesterday on $25,000 bond.

John B. Colantoni, 25, of Beverly, Mass., was returned to the Jefferson Parish jail after a brief hearing before Judge Ernest V. Richards on the charge of communicating false information of planned arson.

He could get up to 20 years in prison if he is found guilty of telling a customer service representative that there was a bomb in a box he had checked onto Flight 1014 to Washington, DC.

Police quoted United Airlines representatives Monday as saying that Colantoni made that claim after becoming angry because a skycap told him he could check only six of his eight bags without an additional charge.

No bomb was found and the plane left 15 minutes late to Dulles International Airport, said a United reservations clerk who asked not to be identified. A flight to Chicago, scheduled to leave a half-hour later, was delayed 45 minutes, the clerk said.

The FBI presented the case to the US attorney's office, which decided against prosecuting Colantoni on a charge of threatening to destroy an airplane, said FBI spokesman Volney Hayes.

The federal charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $5,000 fine.

Although Colantoni later admitted no bomb was in his baggage, federal law requires airports to detain and question anyone making a bomb threat and to thoroughly search the area where the bomb supposedly was planted, airport officials said.

Expert: proposals may limit chem. buildup

By C.C. SANDORFI
Collegian Staff

Last in a two-part series

The spread of chemical warfare capabilities worldwide may soon be checked by proposals made at a recent international conference, according to a member of the Federation of American Scientists.

The Paris Conference on the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons was an important landmark in the struggle to control the proliferation of chemical weapons, said Charles Flowerree, who spoke recently at a University of Massachusetts forum.

Flowerree said the conference, held in January, set forth four main points in its declaration.

The first was to reaffirm the Geneva Protocol of 1925, prohibiting the use of chemical weapons, he said. However, Flowerree said the Geneva Protocol, the sole international instrument applied to chemical warfare, is outdated, comparing it to a "broadsword when it comes to arms control."

The second aim of the Paris Conference was to exhort each nation "to exercise restraint and to act responsibly," he said.

One drawback of this goal is the absence of a universally recognized list of chemicals necessary for a chemical warfare capability, Flowerree said. The United States has imposed controls on a dozen chemicals, but most other countries with control lists include many fewer chemicals, he said.

The third feature of the Paris declaration was a call for the early completion of efforts to strengthen UN procedures for the investigation of alleged Geneva Protocol violations, he said. An expert group is trying to establish guidelines for investigation, he said.

Although Great Britain suggested the UN be allowed to investigate alleged violations, objecting nations have stalled deliberation, Flowerree said, adding that as a result, the UN's power is still very limited. The UN can only act when use of chemical weapons has occurred, he said.

The banning of chemical weapons toward arms control, the final element of the Paris Conference, is the only sure way to rid the world of the threat of chemical warfare, Flowerree said.

The current effort is far enough along that a convention banning the development, production, stockpiling, and construction of weapons is feasible, he said.

However, Flowerree said, "It is probably accurate to say that a chemical weapons convention would be the most complicated arms control measure ever attempted."

The elimination of the threat of chemical warfare must incorporate elements of the Paris Convention, but also global concern, he said.

"What will be needed, above all, is widespread support from all concerned governments as well as from all segments of society," he said.

Amherst holds elections

Participation from Greeks bolsters turnout

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Town and county elections were held yesterday in Amherst to elect members to the Select Board, School Committee, Town Meeting and other offices. Results of the election were not available at deadline. However, voter turnout was expected to be above average, according to poll workers.

Fifteen UMass students were on the ballot for Town Meeting.

Ten of the students were from the Greek Area. Shashi Bharvirkar, president of the Intrafraternal Council said he expects a large turnout from students at precinct 10, the Bangs Community Center.

"I have talked to the Greek Area presidents and they are encouraging all Greeks to vote. There will be a huge turnout after dinner," Bharvirkar said.

Poll workers said they were pleased with the turnout for a town election.

"There's been a lot of interest in the town elections this year, I think the fraternities' participation may have been influential," said Mary Andrews, warden of precinct 10.

"For a town election, the turnout was probably average. So far, as of 5:00 p.m., 242 people have voted and there are 1,048 registered voters in precinct 2," said Precinct Warden, Esterica McGill. "It usually picks up during and after the dinner hour. I would guess the final tally will be between 350-400 voters."

Turnout was above average at Precinct 3 in the Immanuel Lutheran Church, according to poll worker, Debbie March-Riddell. "We have had 143 voters come in, and we expect 200 out of the 1,048 by the end of the night. It's been slow but steady."

Poll workers said the turnout was better than expected because in the races for Select Board and School Committee there were two positions open and three candidates running for office.

UMass group, prof. find ancient seaport

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

On the coast of Israel lies a secluded peninsula blanketed for centuries with nothing but yellow sand — an area so small that it barely interrupts the Mediterranean Sea.

Beneath the tranquil beaches of the Tel Nami site, however, lie restless ghosts from what was once a thriving international seaport 4,000 years ago.

The priceless artifacts, ranging from bronze and gold jewelry and weapons to the graves of the ancient sea peoples, were left sleeping undisturbed until they were unearthed in a major discovery by a group from the University of Massachusetts last summer.

Michal Artzy, a professor at the University of Haifa, discovered the site four years ago, rationalizing that the area, located 15 miles south of the modern seaport Haifa, was probably used as a seaport before the construction of harbors because of its immediate proximity to the sea.

Artzy, who is teaching at UMass this year and is also lecturing tonight at Amherst College, said she leads a student expedition to Israel every summer since the finding, but added that previous expeditions failed to yield a major archaelogical boon.

Last summer the long-awaited discovery arrived when the group unearthed a host of 3,300 year-old bronze, ivory, and gold artifacts, including jewelry, incense burners, and religious symbols, she said.

"Under the sands is a living place — a seaport," she said, speculating that it was abandoned by an unknown civilization because of bitter elements or flooding by the sea.

Pottery and complete storage containers were also discovered, some filled with raisins, peas and olives, leading the group to believe the ancient people led a healthy dietary existence, she said.

Artzy said she suspects the wealthy seaport was accessed by many nations in the area because jewelry possibly belonging to Egyptian royalty was unearthed, as well as pottery from the Mycenaens and Cretians in Greece, and artifacts from Anatolia, Babylon, and Mesopotamia.

"It went to sleep and waited for us," she said of the once-hidden civilization. "Once you start excavating, you're immediately transformed into time 3,300 years ago. There's only sand between you and that."

The group has also discovered a 6,000 year-old underwater civilization off the peninsula's coast, and will explore this area as well as continuing research above ground in another expedition this summer, Artzy said. The expedition is open to all students for three or six week sessions from May to July.

Artzy will lecture on her discoveries tonight at 8 p.m. in the Merrill Science building at Amherst College.

Panel: Black history woven into quilts

Two Smith faculty members join panel of speakers

By C.C. SANDORFI
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Quiltmaking is an art that carries many historical and cultural implications for Black women, according to a panel of speakers Monday night at Smith College.

The panel — two members of the Alberta, Ala., Freedom Quilting Bee, a Black women's cooperative rooted in the Civil Rights Movement, and two Smith College faculty members — said quilts were often symbolic of Black history.

"Historically, quilts have been made from the fabric of memory," said Cynthia Smith, a professor of literature in the Afro-American studies department. "They were created from odd pieces of fabric, insignificant materials that took on larger meanings."

Some of the scraps included bits of dresses or shirts and fabric from Civil War uniforms, she said.

Many pre-Civil War quilts reflect African culture, she said. Adrianne Andrews, an instructor in Afro-American Studies, said many slaves who made quilts for their masters — as well as those they made for themselves — used traditional African patterns.

The bright colors and bold designs were reminiscent of the old cultures and helped preserve their roots, she said.

Estelle Witherspoon and Nettie Young, members of the Freedom Quilting Bee, said they began quilting at a very young age. Colorful quilts were abundant in their rural, poverty-stricken Wilcox County, where both women grew up, Witherspoon said.

However, Young said, the quilts were made for practicality, not decoration.

"We put them on the walls to keep the wind out," she said. The walls and ceilings were so dilapidated "we could look through [them] at night and see the stars," she said.

In 1966 the quilts found a new use, Witherspoon said.

A young civil rights worker passing through town saw a quilt hanging in a backyard. He was so impressed with the design and workmanship that he bought that quilt and several others, she said.

He sent them to New York City for sale and turned the profits to the women who made them, Witherspoon said. They used the money to try to counter some of the poverty in the town and to work for their civil rights, specifically the right to register to vote, she said.

The cooperative grew out of the experience, Young said. Since then the Bee has sold quilts and used the profits to raise the standard of living in Alberta, she said.

"We're not in it for the money," Witherspoon said. "We do it for the benefit of the community."

Letter to Campus Community

Staff members of University Mental Health Services wish to express our support for all campus groups who are working towards an increased awareness of diversity issues in our community.

We are reminded, as Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Awareness week approaches, of the valuable contribution this group makes to our campus culture. However, we are also reminded of the misunderstandings and fears that continue to shape our attitudes towards Lesbians, Gay and Bisexual people.

We, mental health professionals at the University, are strongly encouraging faculty, staff and students to attend Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Awareness week activities (April 7-14). Our hope is that together we can work towards building a camous community that not only accepts but appreciates the diversity of its members.

Anthrax ambiguity

Militarily-funded research has put local activists up in arms and Amherst officials on edge

By NANCY KLINGENER
Collegian Staff

Even the people who want to get rid of anthrax research at the University of Massachusetts think an accident is highly unlikely.

But local activists who want the study banned as a health hazard have taken their case to the Amherst Board of Health and now Town Meeting.

Because the study has received $1 million from the US Army's Biological Defense Research Program, the activists believe it contributes to a "biological arms race" and should be stopped.

"The threat of biological warfare is a health hazard," said John Bonifaz, who is leading the campaign against the study for the American Friends Service Committee.

"We feel that is a concern for a local board of health, just as much as a break in a sewage line, or something of that nature," Bonifaz said.

University officials have accused the activists of "scare tactics," and of needlessly frightening Amherst residents about the safety of research on the campus.

"This is a very scary thing. We believe that there are very serious health threats involved with germ warfare research," Bonifaz said. "If people are scared, they should be."

Deeply committed partisans on either side of this issue see dangers all around. The AFSC and a group of students who first called attention to the research believe the Army is violating a 1972 treaty banning biological warfare.

The University, on the other hand, believes interference with its research threatens academic freedom.

Next month, Town Meeting voters are scheduled to decide whether Amherst will be declared a "biological warfare research free zone." Such a declaration, if passed, would advise the Board of Health to ban all research in Amherst funded by the Biological Defense Research Program.

Microbiology Professor Curtis Thorne has been studying anthrax since 1948. He has a lab in Morrill Science Center like countless others, with sinks and computers and piles of research documents.

Thorne started publishing scientific papers about anthrax since 1968, but never received much public attention for his work. Suddenly, he is at the center of a debate on military influence on campus, and the town's jurisdiction of the University.

"I thought it was too bad they had to go about it dishonestly," Thorne said of the people who want his lifelong study ended. "They tell half-truths and sometimes completely untruths to get people frightened."

Thorne is careful to emphasize that he is not studying the anthrax disease itself — he is studying Bacillus anthracis, the bacterium that causes anthrax.

"Non-virulent means it does not cause disease, and we work with non-virulent strains," Thorne said. "If there was a health hazard, why wouldn't somebody have brought it up previously?"

The disease anthrax is infectious, and usually fatal in cows and sheep. Anthrax can also be fatal to humans — but it is rare and treatable. Thorne is studying the genetic structure of the bacterium, looking for a better vaccine for the disease.

The Biological Defense Research Program funds Thorne's study because "they're interested in defending troops and population if necessary against anthracis if it should be used as a biological warfare weapon," Thorne said.

That's where the AFSC and a small group of students, called People for a Socially Responsible University, disagree. The Army wants a vaccine, they say, to use as a weapon.

"There is no way that troops can be protected against the threat of biological weaponry. It's really impractical to think that we can vaccinate our troops against every possible agent," Bonifaz said. "You vaccinate your troops when you plan to use an agent against someone else."

Opponents of the research don't blame the University for biological warfare research — that's the Army's business and they would like to see the Army accountable, they said.

They blame the University for holding Department of Defense contracts.

Jonathan Leavitt and about five other students started looking into military funding at UMass about a year ago, with the aim of discovering where the money was being spent, and how.

> "I worked on anthrax here long before I was funded by the DOD (Department of Defense) and if I weren't supported by the DOD, I'd still work on it."
> –Professor Curtis Thorne

Their long-term goal is to get rid of all military funding at the University, said Leavitt, a junior history major.

"Once the University fails to be in a position to criticize the government, then we're in a situation that's really scary for everybody," Leavitt said.

The students found a number of influences they didn't like, from military funding for the new Polymer Science Center, to political science courses taught with a "Cold War mentality."

They also found Curtis Thorne, in his fortieth year of studying anthrax.

Thorne's contract with the Army was one of 15 contracts the students pinpointed for closer inspection. They turned to the Office of Grants and Contracts.

"That's where we met our first resistance," Leavitt said. "They wouldn't give us access to the information."

American Friends Service Committee members John Bonifaz, left, and Frances Crowe, believe the anthrax research violates a 1972 treaty banning biological warfare.

The office was "taking tremendous amounts of time" and "charging exorbinant rates" for the contracts — 20 cents a page copying costs and $6 an hour for any time spent on the request, Leavitt said. The students saw the bill rising swiftly out of their range.

They contacted administrators, who didn't help them much, then found a few faculty members, who did, Leavitt said. The time and copying costs were cut in half, and the students had their information.

They publicized their findings in the Valley Advocate and the Daily Hampshire Gazette, and came to the notice of the American Friends Service Committee.

"We're opposed to war. We are a Quaker organization that believes war settles nothing. We're deeply concerned about the biological weapons treaty being violated," said Frances Crowe, an AFSC veteran.

The AFSC first took their case to Chancellor Duffey, requesting him to halt the research immediately. When Duffey did not comply with their request, the committee turned to the Amherst Select Board, which referred the activists to the Board of Health.

Health Board members were reluctant to go so far as denouncing the University, but scheduled a public hearing on the issue. That hearing was cancelled, but board member Diana Stein had made a key suggestion: take the fight to Town Meeting.

Next month, Amherst Town Meeting members will decide whether the town will be declared a "biological warfare research free zone." If the declaration passes, Town Meeting will advise the Board of Health to ban all studies funded by the Biological Defense Research Program.

Thorne's study has received about $1 million over the past decade from the Army, said James Langley, a UMass spokesman. Langley said that if the research were stopped, in the middle of a contract, the University and the town, or both, could be sued.

"I'm not about to get into a public debate on the morality of DOD [Department of Defense] research. I'm proud to be doing something for the DOD," Thorne said. "I worked on anthrax here long before I was funded by the DOD and if I weren't supported by the DOD, I'd still work on it."

The town of Amherst is already a self-declared "nuclear-free zone," the result of an earlier AFSC campaign. An environmental movement is moving the town toward calling itself a "foam-free zone," which would ban non-biodegradable plastics from disposal in town limits.

Now the unique road of Amherst politics is leading the town into direct conflict with the University. Activists, administrators, scientists and town officials all have different views on the struggle.

"I'm very upset at the Amherst Board of Health. This whole thing could have been squelched at the beginning, if they had bothered to talk to me," Thorne said. "I believe in equal treatment for both sides, but there hasn't been equal treatment here."

The struggle over anthrax research in Amherst will continue, even if Town Meeting defeats the declaration. A federal lawsuit against the Biological Defense Research Program, brought by a national activist group, is scheduled to be filed today, Crowe said.

If the national group, the Foundation of Economic Trends, wins the suit, the UMass study would lose its government funding, along with studies around the nation.

The lawsuit will be a long process, but Amherst is becoming a "test case" for the anti-germ warfare movement — activists are hoping to set a precedent with a "biological warfare research free zone," and inspire other towns to similar declarations.

"It would be incredible," Leavitt said. "It would be the first in the country, probably the first in the world. But it wouldn't stop there."

US foreign policy fuels fires of Cuban resentment

Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev visited Cuba earlier this week in part to encourage Cuban President Fidel Castro to promote greater political openness in the Caribbean island.

Although the Soviet leader's reformist message has fueled the optimism of many Western observers who want to believe in the genuineness of Gorbachev's drive for reforms, we must remain realistic about Cuba. Castro, who has held a grudge against the United States since taking power in 1959, has and will likely continue to frown on the Soviet leader's reforms. Castro has resisted the reforms and lashed out at what he calls their promotion of "capitalist euphoria."

The Cuban leader's antagonism toward the United States will likely continue. Even if he embraces Gorbachev's philosophy and launches a Cuban version of glasnost, he is unlikely to appear on the evening news smiling and shaking President George Bush's hand.

We witnessed such a scenario with Gorbachev and former President Ronald Reagan, even though the United States and the Soviet Union have nurtured an intense adverse relationship since the end of World War II, when the arms race kicked off.

But Cuba is a different story.

The adverse relationship between Cuba and the United States began officially in 1959 when Castro led a group of nationalists in a revolt that toppled the US-controlled government. Since the Spanish-American War in 1898, when Cuba gained theoretical independence, the United States had maintained a tight hold of the island's politics.

Pedro Pereira

Congress in 1901 approved the Platt Amendment, in which the United States retained the so-called right to intervene in Cuban affairs when necessary to preserve the island's "independence." The amendment also prohibited the Cuban government from signing treaties with foreign powers without US permission.

Besides using the legislative weapon to bully Cuba, the United States shipped Marines to the island when necessary to insure the natives wouldn't get out of line.

The morally questionable US actions in the island have dissipated from the collective memory of most Americans. Today Americans are only too eager to point out the evil inherent in the Cuban socialist regime, which has allowed for the shipment of Cuban troops to Angola to spread the red.

Logic, however, would support the contention that Cuba owes its socialist regime to the United States. Like a child that rebels against a parent's tyranny, Cuba, with chants of "Yankee go home," adopted a political system diametrically opposed to the United States' republicanism, thanks to Castro's charisma and political shrewdness.

Although Americans prove forgetful when it comes to US interventionism, the Cubans remember. Castro remembers.

He remembers that his country was subjected to American bullish rule for more than 60 years. He has enough reasons to remain suspicious of Americans. His improbable version of glasnost will have no room for improving relations with the United States.

Gorbachev's reforms did. But the United States never controlled his country's government, probably because we never had a chance to do so.

There's nothing wrong with man-to-man affection

Is it indeed possible for a man to have as close a friendship with another man as with a woman? Could a man reveal his innermost feelings and thoughts, wishes and fears, hopes and dreams to another man? Is it natural for two men to turn to each other for reassurance and comfort in times of trouble? Can two men kiss and embrace each other as an expression of their friendship? Well?

Scott Green

If these two happened to be women, you would probably not hesitate to answer with a resounding yes. And if it was a man and a woman you would still probably answer yes.

Understandably, one would be hesitant to answer yes in the case of two males. Society has conditioned us to view such a scenario as a sign of weakness, weirdness or homosexuality. Men cannot possibly be loving, tender, feeling, receptive or giving unless directed at the opposite sex.

In a sense, men and women have grown up in two different cultures, with various values and attitudes and divergent ways to express emotion. While women can show their friendly affection such as a hug or a kiss, without stirring up anxieties of homosexuality, a good natured slap on the back or a punch on the shoulder is as far as most men can comfortably go.

Heterosexual Robert, on a camping trip with his best friend, feels an urge to hug him. But afraid that an embrace will throw them both into a what-next sexual panic, he consciously refrains from this expression of affection. Robert sees this urge as a wish to express his love for his friend and not as a wish for sexual conjunction. But his fear, a common male fear, is that if we hug, the next thing you know, we'll take off our clothes and go down on each other.

By the time we reach manhood, the walls have been built which make deep friendship unusual, and for many of us, an act of courage. We are trained early to keep our guard up, not to be tender and vulnerable with each other. "Wimp", "faggot", "sissy" — these little words you hear in every corridor of every junior and senior high school (and even in elementary school) are constant reminders to act tough, to act like a "man".

Remember way back when if you cried, you were a "sissy?" And if you didn't play sports you were automatically a "faggot?"

Here is one man's not untypical description of his relationships with his three "closest" friends:

"There are some things I wouldn't tell them. I wouldn't tell them about my work because we've always been highly competitive. I certainly wouldn't tell them about my feelings or any uncertainties with life. And I wouldn't talk about any problems I have with my marriage and sex life." Then he paused and laughed and said: "That doesn't leave a hell of a lot, does it?"

Men are hurt by the conditioning that makes us half-human. We are hurt by our dependence on women for support, nurturing, love and warm feelings. It is a real struggle for heterosexual men to restore their sense of being fully human, for them to relate to other men (be they heterosexual, bisexual or homosexual), in the capacity they normally reserve for women.

Close male friendships are rare, so if you are a part of one or know of one, consider yourself fortunate. For those of you who do not, keep an open mind; do not allow yourself to become a product of stereotypical society. Contrary to popular myth, it is possible for a man to have a close friendship with another man and not be a homosexual!

Say no to seventies styles

Just say no.

This isn't a Nancy Reagan speech on drugs. It is, however, a speech on your moral obligation.

Something is happening that I never thought could ever occur again. It may not be something that everyone can relate to. If your a first-year student you may not realize its implications, but maybe you can be helped by someone who is a veteran of the problem.

Nancy Cohen

The seventies styles are coming back again.

To many of you who might share my mentality, this is a very scary thought.

Some of you might even have nightmares about wide collars and bell-bottoms. I know I do.

For those of you who don't understand why this is such a horrible proposition, let me refresh your memory.

It's 1978. Saturday Night Fever is the number one album. John Travolta (without the muscles) is considered a demi-god, or at least close to it. Everyone thought he and his buddies were real sharp dressers. Who wouldn't? I love to have men with hairy chests, lots of gold necklaces and shirts unbuttoned down to their navel come up to me and ask "Hey babe, what's your sign?"

People were taller back then, not because the food was more nutritious, but because platform shoes was the happenin' look. They looked so cool, it didn't matter whether you could walk in them or not.

Women's wardrobes consisted of shiny-neon, skin tight spandex/polyester pants which were real comfortable to wear while doing house work, and shopping — you know, every day women things (at least during the seventies they were). Tube tops and matching berets, with glittery stuff on them were always a nice touch.

For fun, people went roller discoing, and did the hustle which basically consists of a lot of pointing and shaking of one leg. (See Saturday Night Fever.) Everybody was shaking their booty.

Sound good? If it does, please don't read this any longer because I will only offend you more than I already have.

If your answer is no, I congratulate you on your taste, good sense and style. You must have some if you don't think the Bee Gees are really awesome driving music or that Donna Summers was truly a misunderstood artist.

Well here we are, the era of safe sex; workout clubs are the single bars of the eighties, sensitivity is stressed women wanting equal rights (and we're really not kidding around this time), most people are at least attempting not to be oppressive (if they are, they're not very popular) and most importantly, thin ties and tapered legs are in style.

How, in this wonderful (?) society could we possibly have room for songs such as Bad Girls and Xanadu? Could we imagine reliving the era of fast love and introducing yourself in the morning to some guy named I.L. (he changed it to International Lover?

The fate of future generations is in our hands. We can not sit idly by and watch fashion designers rip a part everything we have worked so hard for — not to mention it's just plain embarrassing.

My solution is to just say no.

The next time your driving down the avenue and you find yourself humming along with Andy Gibb's Shadow Dancing, stop yourself and realize what you are doing.

Column only scratches surface

I would like to comment on Scott Green's article ("Behind the Iron Curtain," March 30). His impressions of East Germany and Poland were interesting. As a world traveller at heart, I am always delighted to read about impressions of countries in which I've never been. Mr. Green's last line, however, struck a cord in me which impelled me to write. Contrasting the two radically different countries, he said of Poland, "This is not East Germany, the Soviet Union's best satellite buddy, where people are treated like animals in a cage under an old line, Stalinist leadership." I take this to imply that Soviet citizens are cold and gloomy, as are the East Germans described in the article.

In 1986, I visited the Soviet Union. My impressions were somewhat similar to Green's impressions of East Germany: grey buildings, despondency, gloom. However, my experiences went deeper than sight allows. I was lucky enough to dine (clandestinely) in a private Soviet home in one of those buildings. I was also lucky enough to be approached by the armed Soviet soldiers on the street — a scary experience to be sure. But I say I was lucky in that case because it made me aware of the daily pressures the Soviets have learned to live with, and indeed flourish under.

Unlike the West's misconception of the Soviets, they are actually warm, receptive people. They, like the Poles described by Green, were inquisitive about my home and my life. To them, America is a mixed bag of dreams and ambivalence that most of them will never have the opportunity to see first-hand.

Yes, many have cold, gloomy faces. Wouldn't you if you had to live in those grey buildings? Wouldn't you if you had to stand in three different lines to buy one item (one line to select the item; one line to pay for it, and one line to pick it up)? Wouldn't you if everything you did had red tape attached (much like visiting the Registry of Motor Vehicles every day!)?

Overall, the Soviets develop deep, lifelong friendships among themselves which make ours seem shallow. They've suffered greatly and still retain a great deal of spirituality. Oh, and one last thing: Not all Soviets are Communists. In fact, only six percent of the Soviet population is registered in the Communist Party.

NUMMO is the magic power of the spoken and written word. With each word translated there escapes vapor. Vapor is a form of water. Water is necessary for the existence of all life forces on earth.

The Black News Service strongly believes that our newspaper will speak the truths of the protractive struggle of black people. Only through the truth can we, as a people develop a true and precise knowledge of the world and its perspectives. When we receive knowledge, it is our duty to use it and share it with you, our fellow brothers and sisters.

It is through this exchange of written information which you, the people transfer the spoken word into power. Then together we will surely become the creators of our creative life forces, our destiny.

I am, because we are, and since we are, therefore I am.

It Takes A Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back

CONTRIBUTED BY: ROBIN PRATTS

On March 21, 1960, some 69 people were killed at the Sharpeville Massacre, and the ensuing incidents, where men, women, and children had been peacefully protesting the Pass Laws. Over the next week, 22,000 people were arrested or detained, and the ANC and Pan-Africanist Congress were outlawed. Both groups called for a one day general strike in mourning for the victims. Both Mandela and Sobukwe (PAC) had called for non-violent resistance, until the Sharpeville Massacre. This is the kind of event which Black South Africans face on a daily basis.

Why have Black people faced such brutality, on a regular basis, in South Africa? The cause is the Apartheid system which is designed to segregate and racially oppress Black Africans within South Africa. Apartheid in Afrikaner, means 'separatness' or 'apartness'. What it has meant for Black South Africans is constant harrassment, degradation, exploitation, violence, and murder.

This 'separateness' has taken the form of pass laws, which require all Black people to carry 'passbooks' at all times. These 'passbooks' contain an individual's fingerprints, a photograph, and employment records, and if these are not produced upon demand, Black people are jailed and fined. As of 1960, an average of 1.25 million a year have been tried for trivial offences against Apartheid, including nearly 1,000 people a day being convicted of pass law offences, since 1948.

Another aspect is the segregation program of the so-called 'homelands' or bantustans. By 1980, 3.5 million people had been herded onto the poorest 13 percent of the land, where the bantustans reside, with more going each day. 81 percent of these people live below the poverty line. The bantrustans have also broken up many families because the settlements are so far from where Black workers go to work. In KwaNdbele, Black workers can see their families when they get home, late at night, but the time is brief since they travel 48 hours a week for work. In other places that are not so 'close', such as Transkei, most male workers live as migrants in single-sex hotels near the cities. This destroys the family structure by forcing many Black men to leave their families.

Black people have tried to respond to Apartheid through a variety of means. They have tried non-violent protestation and demonstrations such as at Soweto in 1976 when 21 Black people were killed and 220 injured when police opened fire on a non-violent student demonstration. The students were singing Black Nationalist songs when police arrived, only the White officers having guns. The students taunted, but did not assault, the police, when a tear gas bomb was fired into the crowd. The students threw rocks and the police opened fire with revolvers and sub-machine guns, firing some 300 rounds.

Those who want peaceful change have faced many attacks such as this, but the Apartheid state also uses less publicized means. Those who have been arrested also have to face methodical, wide-spread torture by the police and authorities. On August 23, 1985, Bessie Nobathembu Fihla was arrested and interrogated. During which time she was forced to crouch for long periods with heavy books in her hands, as well as receiving electric shocks to her thumbs and toes. She was never charged with a crime. Her brother, Kenneth, was beaten and given electric shocks. The courts ignored his pleas as insufficiently urgent. Other reports mention beatings with whips, electric shocks, and psychological torture, such as putting pistols to detainees' heads and prolonged sleep deprivation.

In response to the torture and the organized violence of the Aparteid State, non-violence has proven incapable of finding a solution to the oppression of Black South Africans. Many Black people and anti-Apaartheid organizations, nationalist and internationalist, have chosen to struggle in other ways.

In August of 1987, 340,000 Black coal and gold miners went out on strike for wage increased, and the company police and South African police attacked them with whips, tear gas, and other weapons, killing several workers. They were cautious and unable to easily break the strike because the Black workers occupied the mines and fought back with stones, clubs, and fire-bombs.

Many organizations put forward programs which demand the overthrow of the Aparteid state by whatever means are most effective and result in the least bloodshed, such as the ANC, SWAPO, and a handful of revolutionary socialist organizations. Many Black South Africans recognize that the only way to end Aparteid is by meeting attacks with an organized, militant fight that recognizes the need for violence.

The violence used by the Black South Africans and groups who represent them is not the same as the violence of the South African state. The violence of Black people is part of a defensive struggle to survive; it is the fight of the slave to be free; it is the fight against oppression, expoitation, racism and murder and it is for human dignity, racial equality, and a free South Africa. This is directly opposite in its nature to the violence of the slave master-Apartheid state, which we have already shown as it occurs daily.

In light of this, we feel it is necessary to support the struggle of all Black South Africans against Apartheid and South African state, and we fight for their right to be free BY ANY MEANS NECESSARY.

Banneker Openning

by Simone Nicholson

After five years of intensive planning, on Friday March 31, 1989, the Benjamin Banneker Computing Center in rooms 411-417 of New Africa House finally opened.

At a reception in the Banneker Center on Friday, interested parties had the opportunity to look the facilities over. Junior, Political Science major Devita Gross, a resident of Southwest said "'I have been hearing about this computer center opening up ever since my freshmen year. I was beginning to think it was never going to happen.'"

The Center consists of 16 MacIntosh terminals. 12 have dual floppy disk drives, the remaining four have access to graphics software and font libraries. In addition to the terminals, also included are a color monitor, four dot matrix printers, and two laser writers. A special feature is a 16 level digital scanner which will be used to continually feed resources such as syllabi into the computer for student use. All of these features will enable the center to be transformed into "'an interactive, multimedia research center in Afro-American, Afro-Caribbean, and African Studies, which the facilities three year plan,"' says Ernest Allen, Director of the Banneker Center.

The Benjamin Banneker facility for all its innovative technology, is also a part of history. The center's namesake was a black farmer in 18th century Maryland, who established himself as an astronomer, mathematician, publisher of almanacs and surveyor.

A printer on the South wall of the center is named the "'Freedom's Journal"', which was the first black owned newspaper in the nation. The actual individual terminals represent stations of the underground railroad. "'No stu-

Cross-Racial Collegiality: Trouble in Academia contributed by: 'BLACK ISSUES IN HIGHER EDUCATION"

Although Black-white relations are improving in society, resistant pockets can be found in places least expected. One of these is academe, which began recruiting Black professors in the sixties. Even though the recruitment has dropped off, many of those first recruited have now taught in predominantly white institutions of higher education for more than twenty years. Others have long since retired from them. In general, those who remain have yet to achieve real collegiality with their white cohorts, the majority of whom react to them with varying degrees of fear, indifference, misunderstanding, and uneasiness.

The inequality is first evidenced by the 'Guess Who's Coming To Dinner' criteria used to recruit Blacks. That is, in order to counterbalance for race, white universities search for Blacks with superstar credentials when in fact their faculty in general reflects a normal curve in terms of talent and output. The superstar search is evident everywhere, but is generally the norm at private colleges and universities because they are more conservative in race relations than public institutions. Black professors at these universities are almost non-existent on the undergraduate level. This may be because of the impact they would have on the host of undergraduate students who are going through their developmental formative years. If you change the attitudes and beliefs of undergraduate students at this stage of development you change society.

The relaxed affirmative action efforts on the part of the current Republican Administration has allowed private and public institutions of higher education to maintain the status quo, in terms of hiring, retaining,and promoting minority faculty, to say nothing of collegiality during their tenure. So when administrators say they are looking for Blacks, but just cannot find them, they are in fact saying in shorthand that they are looking for superstar scholars, who are indeed in short supply, regardless of race or color.

Strained collegiality is evident across the campuses at the departmental level, on campus-wide committees, and in the faculty senate. There are several reasons for it. First of all most whites have never had peer relationships with Blacks in which they recognize them as intellectual equals, let alone superiors. Secondly, whites and Blacks alike bring a lot of historical baggage to any communication they undertake. For Blacks, it is the sometimes unconscious and unresolved hostility emanating from slavery, discrimination and contemporary inequality. For whites, the baggage is the unconscious notion that Blacks are inherently intellectually inferior and dissonance created by Black peers being in the same department with them. Thirdly, academe is an arena of intense competition for recognition by students, administrators, by local, regional, national and international peers. Superstar Blacks very often because of their race, aare apt to get more recognition than their white colleagues. Fourthly Black scholars usually approach problem-solving rationally and objectively. For example, Black historians record mor factually the place and importance of Blacks in American history than their white counterparts. That is to say, Black truth and white truth often differ, a fact which can contribute to a great deal of tension in the academic marketplace.

Interracial tension is a significant source of stress for Black professors at predominantly white institutions of higher learning. However, coping strategies differ from one person to another. Blacks who identify strongly with whites or who at least identify equally with whites and Blacks are apt to fit into white academe most comfortable. They, as do their white peers, generally deny the importance of race as a socially isolating factor.

The presence of Black professors in white academe generates interpersonal stress for everybody. Although there is little research indicating the attitudes of whites toward Black professors, the fact that Blacks are having more difficulty today obtaining placement in tenure tracks, getting tenure, and being promoted would suggest that they engender significant dissonance in dominant group professors who harbor residual racism. Students often get caught in the interpersonal cross-fire, especially Black students who seek out the Black professor as a role model to emulate. White professors transfer their hostility toward Black professors onto Black students, when the Black professors advise the minority students.

Unfortunately, Black-white collegiality is not what it ought to be on most campuses. College and university administrators who suspect that interracial relations on campus are less than harmonious should take steps to improve them. The recruitment of more Black professors is an obvious solution to the isolation and alienation often felt by Black scholars. Hiring Blacks for key administrative positions would go a long way toward promoting real collegiality, mainly because Black administrators generally strive to treat people equally regardless of race, and thereby set a positive example for others. Lastly, administrators should institute race relations training. In any case, direct efforts must be made to improve cross-racial collegiality. It will not happen without specific intervention.

dent will be able to enter without a little bit of their history rubbing off,'" says Allen.

After Accord, Angola Turns to Economic Development

by Mark Fortune, Black Enterprise

When Angola emerged from 500 years of Portugese control in 1975, its economic future seemed bright. Its abundant natural resources made it potentially Africa's richest nation. However, the flight of the Portuguese soon after independence-taking their technical skills and vital industrial machinery with them-and 13 years of unabated civil war have taken their toll. The country's war-ravaged economy now lies in tatters, its infrastructure decaying daily.

Once a major exporter of agricultural produce, Angola now has to import much of its food. On the outskirts of Luanda, the nation's capital, destroyed or abandoned vehicles litter the roadsides. Stripped for spare parts, their remains lie slowly rusting in the African sun. The war between the Angolan government and the U.S. and South African-backed rebel forces, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, or UNITA, has displaced hundreds of thousands of these citizens and pushed the infant mortality rate to among the highest in the world.

"'The weakness of our economy is due to the war,'" says Jeronimo Almeida, economic attache to Angol's U.N. mission. "'Acts of aggression by South Africa and UNITA have been destroying the infrastructure in Angola.'"

However, the Dec. 13 signing of a U.S.-brokered tripartite peace accord involving Angola, Cuba and South Africa has led to speculation that a resolution of Angola's civil war is imminent. And the Angolan government has already begun making moves to revive the nation's flagging economy.

The accord, signed in Brazzaville, the capital of the Congo, calls for phased withdrawal of 50,000 Cuban troops (to be completed by mid-1991) that have backed the Angolan government in its war with UNITA.(Cuba began pulling its troops in January, three months earlier than required under the accord.) The accord also calls for the end of South African control of Namibia, which it has occupied in definance of United Nation's decrees since 1966. The agreement, however, does not guarantee an end to the civil war.

"'We believe from what has been accomplished that we will now be able to find a peaceful solution in Angola,'" says Almeida. "'Therefore we now turn our minds to the development of the country.'"

To facilitate this, the Marxist government has implemented an economic recovery plan known in Portuguese as Saneamento Economic Financeiro(economic and financial clean up). To encourage more foreign investment and stimulate business growth, the government will try to shed the centralized Soviet-style economic model adopted by the post-independence government in favor of a more decentralized, market model.

"'We are trying to open up our country for foreign investments in the area of construction and other industries,'" confirms Almeida.

The plan will also encourage cooperative ventures between the government and private entrepreneurs. Legislation encated last year, most notably a new Foreign Investment Act, is intended to provide businesses with incentives such as increased profit margins and less red tape.

Not all are encouraged by the new economic agenda. "'The [plan] has failed,'" asserts Jardo Muekalia, UNITA's chief representative in Washington, D.C.

He believes there can be no workable economic plan in Angola until the nation's political problems are solved. And this, he claims, will not happen until the Angolan government is prepared to sit down at the negotiating table with UNITA as equals.

"'Currently the [government's] only offer is to absorb UNITA,'" says Muekalia. "'That cannot work.'"

A speedy resolution of Angola's civil war and a strengthened Angola is in the economic and political interest of most of the black-ruled nations that border South Africa. Though the leaders of these nations oppose apartheid, they are forced to do business with South Africa, the richest nation in the region.

Petroleum-rich Angola is potentially a cheap source of oil to the region. Its population of 8 million inhabits an area twice the size of Texas, leaving vast tracts of land avilable for food production. Also, the reopening of its Benguela Railroad would provide trading access to its Atlantic coast and allow states such as Benguela Railroad would provide trading access to its Atlantic coast and allow states such as Zambia and Zimbabwe to avoid the costly and politically undesirable option of transporting their exports via South Africa.

A strong Angola "'will make the region more united and more self-sufficient, which South Africa doesn't-want,'" says Mwaza Munthali, a spokesman for TransAfrica, an anti-apartheid lobbying organization based in Washington, D.C. "'The key to its control of the blacks within South Africa is to keep all its neighboring states destabilized.'"

Black Love

by Renai Culpepper

Black man, what happened to the love we once shared?
We survived the middle passage together, kidnapped from our homeland and brought to a land that didn't understand us.
I watched them take the joy from your laugh, the bounce from your step,
the spirit from your body.
But did they take away your love for me too?
They separated our families,
tried to erase our heritage.
Did they break us Black man?
Today, as your mental and my emotional enslavement continues,
you don't turn to me as you
once did,
for understanding,
for love as only I, the Black woman can give you.
The emptiness that is in your eyes,
seeks fulfilment in the wrong,
places.
We are intertwined my love,
I can not reach the stars alone,
just as you can not break our chains, without my help.
Come back to Black man,
let us again find our strength, to raise solid families and keep stable homes.
Together, let us go in search of hope, pride, and spirit.
Come back to me Black man, before we forget how to love.

Don't Insult The Sisters!
by Robin E. Pratts

During Add-Drop about one hundred people crammed into a lecture room in New Africa House that could, at best accommodate fourty-five. Well armed with their add-drop forms and confident composure, zealous U. Mass students waited to be signed into a new class offered this semester entitled 'Black Women.' The chattering crowd was silenced by a middle-aged white woman who stood and very tactfully announced that although she was excited by the great turnout, she and Professor John Bracey simply could not admit all the students. All freshman were dismissed first. Then, all students who were not pre-registered for the class were asked to leave except for graduating seniors, who, they felt should be given top priority. The room was filled with muffled voices of disappointment, anger, and shock. Why was this white woman, and black man teaching a class about black women?

How is it that a large state school with ample resources and networking capabilities can offer a class entitled 'Black Women' and not have a black woman teaching the course? If there was not a black woman professor at this university able and willing to teach the class then why weren't other measures taken to get a black woman that could? I, personally know that there are many intelligent black women who could teach the class...but what about those students that don't? Is not the underlying, unspoken message transmitted to the students discrediting our black sisters? I'm sure many students, black and white, thought to themselves, 'are there so few black women college professors that the administration had to recruit a white woman?' Hmmm...maybe there aren't any. Why else would such a prestigious institution as University of Massachusetts fail to make the effort to obtain a black woman professor?

Professor Joyce Berkman's credentials are impeccable. She's done her homework. But that isn't the point. Would U.Mass hire a chemistry professor who mastered the knowledge of chemistry but never once performed an experiment. Would this school hire a dance teacher who knew every turn and terminology of ballet but never once danced herself? Or how about this. Would you go to a seminar entitled 'Insight into the lives of oppressed South Africans suffering under Aparteid' and the speaker was a white South African? No, no one would.

Based on the examples I've given you, I hope the issue is clear. I have no doubt that Professor Joyce Berkman knows an incredible amount of information concerning black women. Just as the chemist, dance teacher, and white South African mentioned earlier knew about their subjects. However, mastery on an intellectual level in this case, and in the examples given above are simply not acceptable.

We all know the employment office would laugh a so-called chemist out of the building, who never performed an experiment, and a so-called dance teacher who never danced before. Then, why, why I ask is there a white woman co-teaching a class on black women?! My sisters and brothers, the insult is all ours. We, once again are victimized by inherent institutional racism. This is an insult to the sisters that could teach this course, and to the students both than that which is given by a superficial level of text mastery. This level of intellectual, and emotional teaching can only be done by a black woman who not only can talk the talk but who has walked the walk. Let's face the facts. 'You can't teach what you don't know and you can't lead where you don't go.'(or haven't been.)

Black Agenda, A Message To Students

BLACK AGENDA

Dear students of Afrikan decent:

The Black Agenda wishes you well during this mid-term season.

We encourage you to stay strong and resolve to double your efforts in your school work. Know that you can achieve your goals and you will.

In the wake of Minister Louis Farrakhan's visit, there emerged much confusion concerning Black student leadership on campus.

Indeed the foolishness associated with this topic may have caused several of you to become disgusted, disheartened, or disengaged from the efforts to improve our collective condition. Don't be discouraged! Despite the ignorance, there are still strong and effective programs on the way. The episode initiated by many of our Afrikan-American student "leaders" at the first Black Agenda meeting reminded many of points made in Carter G. Woodson's "Miseducation of the Negro":

"If the Negro could abandon the idea of leadership, and instead stimulate a larger number of the race to take up definite tasks and sacrifice their time and energy in doing these things efficiently, the race might accomplish something. The race needs workers, not leaders. Such workers will solve the problems which race leaders talk more about. When you hear a man talking, then, always inquire as to what he is doing or what he has done for humanity. Oratory and resolutions do not avail much. If they did, the Negro race would be in a paradise on earth. It may be well to repeat here the saying that old men talk of what they have done, young men of what they are doing, and fools of what they expect to do. The Negro race has a rather large share of the last mentioned class...Under leadership we have been made to despise our own possibilities and to develop into parasites; by service we may prove sufficient unto the task of self-development and contribute our part to modern culture".

We hope that many of you will become recharged, ready to dedicate a small portion of your time towards self and community development.

WOMEN OF BREWSTER'S PLACE

By Christine Dillon
Nummo Staff

With the exception of The Cosby Show, Frank's Place, A Different World, Roots, 227, The Jeffersons, Amen, Good Times, What's Happening and Black exploitation flick's when was the last time you saw a television sitcom/movie with more than five Black entertainers or better yet, the last time you viewed a powerful Black drama dealing with the lives of "sisterwomen?"

If you are an advent television watcher with a commendable ability or just familiar with the Black movie industry (if there is such a thing), you may be able to identify one or two or even possibly three— but that's just not good enough! There seems to be an underrepresentation of positive, non-stereotypical Black shows appearing on our television screens.

This winter, however, Gloria Naylor's National Book Award-winning novel, The Women of Brewster Place will air on ABC in a dynamic miniseries. Naylor's powerful and moving novel "follows the struggles of seven Black women whose varying paths converge in the Brewster Place projects where they all come to live."

The prominent cast of Brewster Place consists of Oprah Winfrey, who is also executive producer, Jackee, Robin Givens, Olivia Cole, Paula Kelly, Cicely Tyson, Lonette Mckee, Phyllis Yvonne Stickney, Lynn Whitfield, Moses Gunn and Paul Winfield among others. The casts admits to their enthusiasm for the opportunity to portray strong Black characters in a positve drama.

Despite all three networks originally turning down Brewster Place (without reading it), Oprah Winfrey approached the "big-wigs" of ABC entertainment with copies of Naylor's novel; after a brief persuasive opener, they were calling her on the telephone. You see if Oprah wants something, Oprah gets it and she was dedicated to seeing this novel produced for television.

Though the miniseries concentrates on Black women, it is not meant to be offensive in anyway to men. Winfrey points out in an Essence interview, that [they] tried to be very conscious of and sensitive to Black men; and hopes that people understand the pains taken to help relay why the men are portrayed as so. The male characters are complex individuals who show their love as well as their frustration an anger with life.

Naylor's novel received raving reviews and it is very rare that you'll find in the industry, a Black miniseries addressing the trials and tribulations of Black women.

UMass student places his future in Jeopardy

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

Who is . . . Kyle Bostian? A month from now, a lot of people may know the answer to this question. This weekend, April 8 and 9, taping will take place in Hollywood, California for the first Jeopardy! College Championship. Fifteen college students from across the country have been selected to compete in the Championship. Bostian, a senior University of Massachusetts English major, was one of the students selected, and leaves Friday for his appointment with Alex Trebek.

Bostian was vacationing in St.Petersburgh, Florida over spring break, when he and his friends decided to rent a car and go to Daytona. Outside the bustling Texan Hotel, he was approached by a representative from the Competition.

"Some woman handed me a flyer, and I told her I was going to go up and win," he said.

"I took a written test, and played a simulated game. They give you 20 questions in the simulated game, and I got about 12 or 15 right," he added.

When Bostian arrived back in Amherst, there was a message that "Some lady from Jeopardy called." A day later he received the letter saying he had been selected to compete in the Championship. "My roommates and I stayed up and celebrated all night," he said.

All 15 contestants will compete in one game of the quarter-final round. The winners of these five games will go on to the semi-finals. In addition, the four highest scorers of the remaining ten contestants will also advance. The nine semi-finalists will compete in three games, the winners of which will go on to the two-game Grand Final for the Championship.

While portions of the material will be geared toward the interests of college students, the producers of Jeopardy! made clear in their letters to the contestants that most of the questions and clues will be no different than those on the regular shows.

"I watch the show a lot," Bostian said. "For the most part the questions are pretty broad based. There's some trivia, a lot of general knowledge and a good amount of literature. My background should give me some kind of advantage," he added.

All contestants' expenses for the weekend trip will be paid for. All players who advance past the quarter-finals will receive $1000. The semi-finalists who don't make the Grand Final will receive $5000. The three contestants in the Grand Final are guaranteed at least $5000, plus any money they accumulate in the final two games. The winner will go home $25,000 richer.

The Jeopardy! College Championship will be broadcast the weeks of May 8 and 15. Bostian hopes for strong support from his fellow students.

"Hopefully people will be watching for me and cheering," he said.

"I just want to go out there, have some fun, make the Grand Final and hopefully come home with some money."

Fabbo Frith takes flight while Curlew flounder

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Correspondent

Last Friday night's evening of music at Hampshire College Saga Dining Commons, while not really jazz, was nevertheless of interest to adventurous jazz fans. The concert featured Fred Frith and his new band Keep the Dog and Curlew, a more jazz-influenced band led by saxophonist George Cartwright. It was a fine evening of music, despite some questionable planning.

Valley Jazz

So who is Fred Frith? Roughly speaking, he is the British equivalent of Frank Zappa minus the nihilism that has given Zappa his public reputation. He is a guitarist and composer who has been pushing the voundaries of rock for over two decades by incorporating influences from 20th century classical, various European folk musics and free jazz. His music has covered progressive rock, highly complex "avante-garde" music, manic free-form improvisation and "fake folk" tunes. Frith's first band, Henry Cow, along with Zappa, Soft Machine and the Velvet Underground, defined the outer limits of rock in the late 60's through mid70's; miraculously, his music has never lost that adventurous edge. Currently he lives in New York and is part of that city's burgeoning experimental "downtown" music scene.

The band Frith brought to Hampshire College was a pickup group that played arrangements of material spanning the last ten years or so. The tunes Frith chose emphasized the melodic lyricism that coexists with the more complex and abrasive avante-garde tendencies in his music. This was music of incredible depth, beauty and power - one of the best sets of music I have seen in years.

The band's ensemble playing was very tight, especially considering that it was their fourth gig together. Guitarist Rene Lussier and sax/flautist Jean Derome effectively replicated guitar and woodwind parts from the tunes' album versions and added their own personal soloing touches. Synthesist Ted Osterburg and multi-instrrumentalist Zeena Parkins provided lots of color, the former with his creative use of digitally sampled voices and sound effects, the latter with her unconventional instruments (including a homemade harp-like instrument with several electric guitar pickups and a whammy bar). Unfortunately, Frith spent a lot of time in the background on bass, but he occasionally stepped out on guitar and violin and was his usual magnificent self.

After Frith's awe-inspiring set, Curlew was bound to be disappointing - and they were. Playing to a dwindling after-midnight crowd (the show started very late) their music was downright conventional compared to Frith's. It was also uncomfortably derivative of the "harmelodic" jazz/funk/rock gstyle of Ornette Coleman and Ronald Shannon Jackson. Although those not already familiar with this kind of music found Curlew interesting, I found their herky-jerky rhythms, hyperactive soloing and lack of melodic interest rather tedious. The only really good moments came from cellist Tom Cora, formerly of Frith's band Skeleton Crew, who could be described as the Fred Frith of the cello.

Songs of innocence and experience from Hampshire

Beatrice U.T.B./The Equalites/Fred Frith.
Hampshire College
March 31

A tingle shimmied through my spine ana gooey warm feeling softened my soul when the news boxed my ears. Fred Frith was coming to the valley. Today. But before I could jump for joy I learnt he was performing at Hampshire College. Oh well.

Plans concerning "That Petrol Emotion" were thrown to the wind as I jumped into the Saga Dining Commons with six sleazily begotten dollars and all the glee of a first lay. And then I was hung, drawn and quartered and all the glee of a first lay.

And then I was hung, drawn and quartered for not having the extra two dollars necessary for we scum of the earth who do not proudly carry a Hampster I.D. (or have a silly haircut - Ed.). What now? I wanted to listen and adore and be swept away by the magic of Fred (a million adulatory adjectives) Frith, not to be confused with Frank Zappa or Mr. Flintstone.

With tears on my newly ironed lapels and a melancholy heart I walked out to the strains of laughter from the unforgiveably hip Hampster students at the desk.

Humiliated, I saw a beacon of hope - a piece of paper beckoning me onwards in life - to the Tavern and joy upon joys - Beatrice U.T.B. My heart sang, soul newly arisen. And off I ran (Wait a minute son - is this William James, or William Blake? - Ed.).

Matt Bosson, just one of the many sexy tough guys in the band, cheered me yet further with words of wisdom, as his bass lay several feet away begging for his caress:

"Beatrice doesn't sound anything like Fred Frith and we're damn proud of it, but then again I don't know what they sound like."

And then the aptly named Sage popped up - the recipient of more than a dozen pairs of Smithily soiled undies (while on stage of course) and the disputed satyr of the band. I wondered aloud about the conflicts between Matt and Sage:

Sage is funnier than me, cuter than me and taller, but I can beat him in an arm wrestle." At this point the boys were swept away in a tide of feminine lust and were next seen up on the stage being somewhere between silly and great.

Beatrice U.T.B. are a rarity: Sage is one of the few local personalities who actually has some and the band has an incredibly original gimmick: talent. Their tape Demolisten is available at all their gigs and at Main St. Records, cheap. If you don't know who they are then get aquainted. Not only do they have talent, they also don't take themselves so seriously unlike . . .

The Ice Weasels (no relation to the Deep Freeze Mice I hope? - Ed.) who were at the show after an apparently good performance at Saga the evening before. However they declined to comment on anything whatsoever, preferring to look cool. Oh and Mr. Matt Bosson also had a message for his many fans:

"Leave me alone!" he screamed. No, that wasn't it - he said "I love you all more than my own life." Nice chap.

Back to Fred Frith, glimpsed through the Saga windows. About a hundred people sat at tables hoping they were being noticed, while purple lights illuminated the stage. Back at the desk the official stamp-checker said the audience "looked cool" but declined to give away cigarettes. A young lady came out of the show and said "it sort of blew my mind." When asked on what chemicals her emotions were dependent, she laughed insanely and farted.

Apparently, a high spot of the Frith show was when, halfway through, everyone in the crowd began shrieking, "Dicks! Dicks! We want the Supreme Dicks!" Well, maybe twenty people. Frith said, "Who are the Dicks?" And that was it, as reported by the famed guitarist Sam "the Dungeon Master" Dylan.

The other band there, Curlew, was described by an anonymous band member wearing a hat as being "Post Ornette Coleman and kinda like Captain Beefheart." At this point Glen Hughes of Iron Elf made his presence known with the word "Bullshit," screamed at the top of his T.H.C.'d lungs. When asked about the elusive Fred "Not Johnny Winter" Frith, it was the drugs that spoke.

"Hungarian ghoulash of fringe harmonic adventures." He can say such things because he's in a fine young band, as they showed the audience the following night in the Red Barn. It was all too much, so the guy with the pickup and the geek with a pen went to reggae in the form of the Equalites, who were at the Red Barn.

A Caucasian reggae band that looked like aged hippies - but that's shallow - they were a fine old combo with six members, who sounded like they'd been playing together forever. It was the audience, though. In the words of the great ex-Frook bassist Ben Mitchell. "they were extremely uptight, trying to be mellow." Hampshire in its shell-shocked rut.

The final words belong to Peter Malatinaeo, the pajama man of the the up and coming Morphines who played a rousing cover of "Black Bird" in some spot that evening: "What does Hampshire squat on?" he wondered. A number of answers were offered, some a tad rude. But essentially we realised nobody cares and if they do, they're mad.

All of which proves two things: writing about trying to have fun is about as redundant as looking for it at Hampshire College.

Oh, "Fred Frith epitomizes both the irreverent attitude and the technical excellence of the current wave of avant-jazz guitarists." - by Matt Friedman , who also wished he'd seen the show.

In search of the ideal man: the word from the Bird

The Boyfriend School
Sarah Bird
Doubleday

How would you like to meet the man of your dreams? This is what Sarah Bird's new novel The Boyfriend School is all about. While covering a romantic novel "Luvboree" convention, Texan photojournalist Gretchen Griner meets a few authors who decides she needs help in the love department when they find out that her boyfriend Trout is a no-good louse who talks in blues lyrics.

This book is no Harlequin Romance. You'll find no throbbing thighs here. Instead the reader is emotionally stirred. You cannot help but identify with Gretchen (both men and women). She's in a rut, both physically and mentally, but she doesn't let it get her down. Instead she treats things with an irrepressible sense of humor.

Amid the one-liners though is a clear message. Don't give up. Sooner or later you'll get that job, or that guy, or the life that you want. Afterall, if someone with a name like Gretchen Griner can make it, anyone can.

Sarah hits the mark (with Cupid's arrow) in this book. The characters are original, yet easily identifiable. We've all met everyone of her characters in one form or another, from Gus Kubiak, the nerdy guy in the Hush Puppies, to Lizzie Potts, the writer who tells her two-year-old not to put a greasy bolt in her mouth because, "They dissolve our oil-soluble vitamins, which means vitamin deficiency and disease."

The only thing better than her characters is how she works in te romance. You're not bored by three hundred pages of girl chasing boy. You get to know Gretchen before any complications of this sort arise. There's no opening chapter sex scene. Instead you find out about her daily life. When the romance finally does enter the picture you're ready for it; you want it.

Sarah's book, even though it does get romantically explicit at times, should be read by everyone. It's funny, insightful and it hasw a perfect 1990's ending. Happy? Read this book and find out, it might help your present love life.

students are content," Perschetz Malchala said. "If the program had 500 students in it, we wouldn't be able to perform effectively."

Graduates of the program have been especially successful with employment and graduate school, Perschetz Malchala said. About 80 percent of BDIC graduates are hired for a job in their field of interest or have continued with school, she said, adding that this is a higher percentage than any other major on campus.

BDIC major Bruce Ledous said the program has made the difference for him at UMass. "BDIC people take you in, [they] are excited about your ideas, and are actively involved with you," he said. "I don't think you can find such specialized attention [otherwise] in such a big school."

HRTA students win scholarship to attend conference

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts students in the Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration program have won scholarships to attend a conference of Black meeting planners in Memphis, Tenn., later this month.

Junior Etelvina Fonseca and senior Rhonda Miller will have the opportunity to make job connections and learn more about their field when they attend the annual four-day conference of the National Coalition of Black Meeting Planners Association April 13.

The scholarship provides round-trip airfare, meals, a tour of Memphis, and gifts from companies in the industry. The only cost to the students is a $40 registration fee.

The conference gives students an opportunity to meet professionals in the hotel and restaurant industry and sharpen career skills, according to Sherwood Thompson, director of the Office of Third World Affairs, the liaison to the NCBMA.

"They are very diligent students and excellent role models," Thompson said of Fonseca and Miller, adding that the two have a chance to go to the "premier conference for minority professionals in the field."

Fonseca said she was proud to be chosen to represent UMass, but noted a lack of minority professors and support services for minority students.

Miller could not be reached to comment.

HRTA Dean Stephenson Fletcher and the Office of Third World Affairs recommends two Black students for the scholarships each year based on academic achievement, character, and motivation. Two UMass students have attended the conference along with students from around the country each year since 1984.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You are ready to take the big plunge in business or romance. Tensions begin to disappear. Go out of your way to promote a special project or help someone in trouble.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Be thrifty when making entertainment plans. Remember many of the best things in life are free. An out-of-town visitor starts your interest in creative self-expression.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Take advantage of a chance to travel. A romantic imbalance could undermine your self-esteem. You complete projects on time. Impressing higher-ups. Expect a nice bonus.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Letters written today will bring excellent results. A company needs your expertise more than you realize. Suppress an urge to tell the world about your plans.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Timing is the key to your career or financial success. You are able to complete large projects now. Ask yourself if a less profitable chore is more important.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Keep a record of your expenses or you could create a mess that leads to arguments. A good day to take tests and apply for jobs.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You derive immense satisfaction from your work now. An offer will not be repeated; make hay while the sun shines. A surprise encounter with an old friend could lead to romance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Powerful relatives or friends may try to manipulate you. Your creativity is at a peak. The requirements for a job are altered in your favor.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A conservative attitude works to your advantage where joint interests are concerned. Guard your personal possessions. Share a financial burden later.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You will surprise others with your strong opinions. Soften them somewhat if you want widespread support. Personal growth can cause discomfort in the beginning.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Buy or rent new tools and equipment. An unusual offer is made. Greet criticism with a smile and you will blunt it. A raise or special favor is granted after a second request is made.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Do not be shy. Changes in your personal appearance will make others sit up and take notice. Think twice before making a new investment.

● A battle for the starting catching spot that has pushed freshmen Derek Dana and Lou Olivieri to play extremely well. They caught two games each against St. Joe's and both fielded well and did a good enough job with the bat.

● The hitting of Brian Donovan. Maybe it's the shamrock drawn inside the bill of his cap, but whatever it is, the junior college transfer remained hot, boosting his average to .522.

● The play of freshman centerfielder Brian Bright, who continued to hit well and hit his fourth homer of the season.

But there were bad points as well. For instance:

The negatives: Another mediocre pitching performance from Dave Telgheder.

The senior co-captain could have had more luck Monday, as a controversial call kept a St. Joe's rally alive and allowed them to score insurance runs to fight off a UMass comeback.

But Telgheder (0-2, 7.33 earned run average) is a better pitcher than he has shown, both against St. Joe's and against the University of Connecticut last week.

When Telgheder gets into a groove, watch out, but it hasn't happened yet. Hopefully for the team, it will happen soon.

● The last, but maybe most important negative is that fact that UMass only took two games from St. Joe's. On both days, there was a let-up in the second game that allowed the Hawks, who can't matchup talent-wise, to come out with a split.

It is still early, but this lack of a killer instinct could come back to haunt the Minutemen come playoff time.

And thanks to the rain that doused the state yesterday, UMass had a day to give that some thought.

■ let's respect the Hill

All of these changes were met with resistance, but eventually were accepted as part of the rules.

Now the time has come to draw the line. If it were up to the officials of this school, people could fly blimps over Boyden if they wanted. But the fence must be left alone.

Or else . . . the games will go back to the Stadium.

That's right. The athletic department feels that it's only right to give fair warning, and this is sufficient. If any of the slats are damaged during today's game against Brown, the remainder of the home schedule will be shifted to the Stadium, no questions asked.

Surely you don't want that to happen. The Hill is synonymous with lax, and opposing teams detest playing there. It's true.

Anyone who was here two years ago can remember how dreary it was playing every game at the Stadium. Granted it's fine for football, but this dull, lifeless concrete structure just doesn't have any of the charm that the Hill has. It's nowhere near as intimidating on the opponents, the fans are sitting about a mile away from the action on pine slabs. It's way the hell out of the way. The players hate playing there.

Face it, it just ain't right. No doubt if Cornell had to be subjected to the Hill during last year's playoffs rather than the blahs of a rain-drenched McGuirk during finals week, UMass could have been playing Syracuse in the national championship instead of the Big Red.

So for the best interests of everyone, it would be wise to not mess with the fence today, to have fun, but not be unruly. You as fans have the responsibility of making the entrance to Boyden Hill the living hell of any opposing team. It comes with the territory. But please be reasonable and civilized. If you indeed want this university to have one of the best lacrosse teams in the country, give them the support they deserve, but don't push it.

In return, the university has agreed to consider opening the gate at the south end of the field (near Southwest) for easier access for students. Face it, the games are free if you're a student. Most people carry their ID around with them. There's more than enough room on the Hill (and the part that's fenced off will be opened as soon as the new sod has taken root). UMass men's lax is not the toughest ticket in town.

If you do forget your ID, and are too lazy to go home and get it, watch the game from Tobin Hall, or stay home and watch it on NESN. But leave the fence alone. The Gorillas appreciate your support, and right now, helping to keep the games on the Hill, where they belong, is the best support that you can give.

Women's lax falls to Boston College

Turnovers costly for Gazelles in 12-5 loss

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Turnovers, turnovers, turnovers. Perhaps the most telling statistic in sports. If your defense creates them, you'll more then likely win. But if your offense committs too many of them, fold your hands and pray.

In this young season an inability of the the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's attack to hold on to the ball coupled with an inexperienced defense that has not been able to hinder the bad guys has translated to a 1-4 record.

The fourth loss came yesterday to the Eagles of Boston College over in Flutie country, 12-5 with forward Katie Connelly showing the Gazelles just how to take care of the ball by dishing out six assists.

UMass could not deny Connelly the ball all night under the lights as Connelly sprinted around BC's magic carpet unmolested. When she got the ball it was all over.

"You can't let her catch," UMass coach Patti Bossio said. "That is like our whole premise on defense. Don't let her catch because we're not strong enough one-on-one."

For awhile, anyways, the man-to-man Gazelle defense held off the Eagles. With less than ten minutes to go in the first half, it looked as though a defensive struggle was in the works with BC leading just 1-0 after Kim Kiesewitter's goal 8:30 into the first half.

UMass lost its guard on defense for three minutes and the freshmen oriented backfield learned just how much can happen in the small amount of time in college lacrosse as BC beat Gazelle goalie Liz Keats for four goals.

Kiesewitter struck again at 15:18 to put the Eagles up 2-zip. Jeanne Highland was next at 16:54. At 17:22 Katy Finch gave BC another insurance goal and the end of the spurt was finished off by Lexie Denney. All of a sudden, the Gazelles were down 5-0.

If it was not for junior Ann King's goal at 19:54, UMass would have went into the locker room having been shutout in the half.

"What happened is they just ran the ball at th · goal," Bossio said. "We turned the ball over a million times. We can't do anything until we can do the basic skills under pressure."

The Gazelles came out with fire in their eyes at the start of the second half. Two goals by junior Sue Murphy within the first six minutes and another by King brought UMass storming back, down 6-4 with still an eternity left in the game.

The defense however did not keep their part of the partnership, this time giving up four goals in less than two minutes.

"Our defense is so inexperienced," Bossio said. "Their just too late to help. They don't anticipate well and that's just youth."

Brown invades the Hill for big NE clash

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Nine out the last 10 seasons, either the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team or its counterpart from Brown University has won the New England championship.

Save for the recent rise of schools like Harvard and Yale, times haven't changed much. UMass and Brown are still two of the top teams in the region, and today at 3 p.m. they'll battle it out on the Hill in what may be the deciding game in who gets to reign supreme over New England in 1989.

Right now, UMass has a slight edge. The Gorillas are 4-1 and ranked 14th in the latest coaches' poll. Brown is 4-2, losing to national powers Virginia and Syracuse, but fell out of this week's rankings after being at number 13 last week.

Despite what the schedule says, UMass and Brown have already faced each other this year — a scrimmage on March 4 in Providence. UMass regularly scrimmages Brown and usually loses in preseason, but this year was different.

"It's a little scary, because the last five years we lost the scrimmage, but won the regular game," said UMass coach Dick Garber. "We hope the trend doesn't continue."

Of course, the games aren't really connected. The scrimmage usually marks the first outdoor action UMass gets in a given season, and this year's game, which came after just two days outside, was played on turf — on the roof of the Brown field house.

Which obviously is quite different from the cozy and occasionally wild confines of Boyden. Because of a death on the team, Brown didn't play here as scheduled two years ago, so most every member of the team has never been subjected to the Hill.

In last year's contest, UMass traveled to Providence (on a regular field) and played a tight-knit g me for an 8-5 win. The Gorillas were forced into a zone in that game to ward off a tough Brown rally. Whether such a defensive struggle is in the offing for today r mains to be seen.

Clearly it's not in UMass' plans. The Gorillas like to run and gun whenever possible, but have had trouble in recent games, particularly the 10-4 win at St. John's in which they were forced away from the front of the net by a tough pack defense and had trouble hitting passes.

UMass will also have to stop a potentially dangerous Brown attack, led by senior attack Jamie Munro. He had two goals in last year's contest and leads the team this year with nine goals and 14 assists. Freshman attack Darren Lowe (5-16-21), sophomore attack Mike Marinelli (14-1-15) and junior middie Rich Tuohey (10-2-12) follow among the scoring leaders for Dom Starsia's Bruins.

"They're a team that's anchored at attack. Munro is their main offensive strength," Garber said.

In goal is junior Steve Ayers, who sports a .602 save percentage and an 8.67 goals against average.

"They [Brown] are usually very physical. They run hard and hit hard," Garber said. "We're looking forward to a major league game."

Gorilla Grumblings: Today's game will be broadcast on New England Sports Network, with air time set for 10:30 tonight . . . senior goalkeeper Sal LoCascio and junior midfielder Tim Soudan have received an invitation to tryout for the United States entry in the International Lacrosse World Tournament, to be held in 1990 in Australia.

The US team is made up of both college and club players. The best 200 in the country get invited, and only 35 will actually make the team. "It's a good honor to be selected," Garber said.

Rob Codignotto and the Gorillas hope to be doing a lot of celebrating today against Brown at the Hill.

Hill is their home; let's respect it

The following is an open plea to the students of this campus:

Last Wednesday during the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse game against Cornell, there was close to $300 in damages done to the new fence surrounding Boyden Field.

Back in the days of the old, dilapitated rusty fence which enclosed the Hill, students would go to and from class, occasionally stopping along the way to catch about 15 minutes of the game before heading off to some boring lecture. It was a common occurence to see almost as many people gathered outside as there were inside, such as the Army game three years ago when people were seemingly as far away as the 26th floor of the library to catch a glimpse of the action.

Last fall, this came to a close when a new fence was erected. In this day when big bucks rule the domain of college athletics, this became a necessity. Because the NCAA requires a field to be completely enclosed, the need grew to put up a new fence in order to hold the first round of last year's women's soccer tournament at Boyden.

However, the athletic department has shown concern over the select group of students who saw it as necessary to bend or pull out the slats in the fence in order to see the Cornell game from the outside.

It's true that there is tradition is watching the Gorillas from the surrounding areas, but times change. It's inevitable. Gone are the days of tailgating and bringing whatever beverages we wanted into the game.

Minutemen see both good and bad

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

For better or for worse (and probably for better) the University of Massachusetts baseball team saw yesterday's game with Holy Cross College rained out.

Less than 11 hours after arriving back in Amherst from a four-game series in Philadelphia against St. Joseph's University, the Minutemen would have had to load up equipment for a trip to Worcester.

That alone makes yesterday's rainout a benefit to UMass. Consider that the Minutemen play five games in four days beginning tomorrow, and you can see how helpful the extra day of rest must have been.

The only possible negative point is that UMass also had an extra day to think about the St. Joe's series. In each doubleheader, the Minutemen won the first game only to lose a second game they should have won.

UMass, 2-2 in the Atlantic 10 Conference and 7-8 overall, saw some positives and some negatives in Philadelphia.

The positives: The pitching performances of Paul Ciaglo and Don Strange.

Ciaglo, a lefty transfer from Springfield College, threw a three-hitter Sunday and showed excellent control, striking out eight and walking just one. On the year, Ciaglo has struck out 37 and walked six.

Strange, who converted to starting after being primarily a reliever in his first three seasons at UMass, went the distance in the first game Monday allowing six hits and no runs.

Greeks dominate in town elections

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

In last-minute show of comraderie yesterday, the University of Massachussetts Greek area had 11 of its members elected to Town Meeting, commandeering the 10th precinct and ousting two incumbents.

The two defeated incumbents were Lorie Leininger and Richard Miller. Ellen Goodwin and Elissa Rubinstein, both incumbents, shared a 90-vote tie with Irene Friedman. A tie-breaking vote will be cast by newly elected representatives in the near future, according to Sylvia Stoneham, assistant town clerk.

The vote, an above-average turnout, indicated a resounding desire by UMass Greeks to have a voice in town politics. It came just six months after Town Meeting representatives rezoned an area along Phillips Street, heavily populated with fraternities and sororities, effectively capping Greek growth there.

"We are trying to represent students and the community," said Amer Syed, vice president of the Interfraternal Council. "In the past, there has been an antagonistic relationship between the town and students, I want to do away with this and have students needs represented and attended to."

The Greeks on the ballot who were elected include Matthew D. Benelli, Hilary Hirsch, Stuart Hurvitz, David Shulman, Melissa Silverstein, Steve Carson, Amer Syed, Peter Vaz, Milind Sashi Bharvirkar and Debra O'Connell. Brian Novelline of Alpha Chi Rho was elected on a write-in ballot.

"I am puzzled the students' desire to be Town Meeting members," said Goodwin, one of the incumbents in the deadlock. "I think they are one-issue candidates, being the Greek Area zoning issue. Town Meeting involves a lot of time and homework. I can't see that students are that interested in running the affairs of Amherst."

Three other UMass students elected to Town Meeting were Nathan Moore, Dan Costello and Michael Greiner.

In addition yesterday, Selectman Judith Brooks won re-election to her seat, and Fredrick Rice, once a planning board member, was elected to fill former Selectman Allen Torrey's slot. Also victorious were William Field, who ran uncontested for Town Moderator, and Rosemary Sprague, who won the seat of Elector. Oliver Smith Will.

Student security catches an average two shoplifters each day at the University Store.

Shoplifting costs store thousands each year

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

Approximately $75,000 worth of merchandise is stolen from the University Store each year, according to the store manager.

While on average, student security catches two shoplifters a day, as many as 12 thieves have been nabbed in one day, according store manager Winthrop Cummings.

"The University store does $10,000,000 in retail sales a year, and our shrinkage rate is 1.5 percent, which places the value of lost inventory at $150,000," Cummings said. "I would say half of that is a result of shoplifting."

Shrinkage is inventory unaccounted for and is attributed to stolen merchandise, cashier mistakes, damaged items, and mismarked items, according to Cummings.

"A lot of little things enter into it," he said.

"Shoplifting is no more of a problem here than it is in any other store of this size," said Miles Seaver, operations manager of the University Store and the Munchies stores on campus. "Any shrinkage under two percent is considered good, and ours is well under this."

Managers of other stores around campus, including the Munchies stores in the Worcester Dining Commons and the Hampden Student Center, as well as the Coffee Shop in the Campus Center, agree they lose money through shoplifting, but they could not furnish

A co-president of the Orchard Hill Residential Area Government last night asked the Undergraduate Student Senate for $500 for feasting and music, but the senate turned him down.

The money, which would be transferred from Finance Committee funds, would help pay for Bowl Day, which according to co-President Howard Dreyfus, is costing the Orchard Hill government $5,600. Bowl Day is an annual event in the spring that includes performances by local bands and free food.

Finance Committee Chairman James Smack proposed the money's transfer, saying the committee had approved it. He added the transfer would leave the committee with only $300 for the moment.

But Todd Lever, a senator from Cashin Residence Hall in the Sylvan Residential Area, objected. He said granting $500 from committee funds would be unfair because

Trustees OK $53 fee hike

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Staff

Mandatory fee increases for next semester and the appointment of Paul Page as vice chancellor of administration and finance were approved yesterday at the University of Massachusetts' Board of Trustees meeting.

The approved fee hikes will raise the undergraduate cost of attending UMass, including room and board, from $3,808.50 in fiscal year 1989 to $4,051.50 in FY 1990, which begins July 1, an increase of $53, said University Provost Richard O'Brien.

Graduate students who paid $3,422, including room and board, in FY 1989 will see an increase of $36 bringing their total bill for FY 1990 to $3,648, he said.

The Board also approved Chancellor Joseph Duffey's request that the $230 curriculum fee, instituted last year to offset budget cuts, be continued into FY 1990, he said.

The $230 curriculum fee only applies to undergraduate students — graduate students do not have to pay the charge, said Acting Budget Director Joyce Hatch.

O'Brien said the curriculum fee is necessary to the University because without the $4 million the fee gencrates, UMass' schools and colleges would have to come up with the money.

"If it had not been approved we would have been short $4 million. So there really wasn't much choice — and that's assuming we get the House version of the [state] budget approved," he said.

Hatch said the mandatory fee increases are due to inflationary presures, and not on the lack of available state funding for the University.

Every year the trust fund directors who control each account review their financial situation and submit proposals to the administration, where they are hammered out and then forwarded to the Trustees for a final vote, Hatch said.

In other business, the board accepted the appointment of Paul Page to the vice chancellor's post he has occupyied since the retirement of John DeNyse in July of 1988.

Page, although pleased to hear the news of his final approval said, "It feels good in some respects. It's nothing new [because] I've been at it for a while."

In addition yesterday, Professor James V. Tate of the English department and Professor Ring Carde of the entomology department were named by the board as distinguished professors of the University.

"In both cases they are exceptional and distinguished people in their fields," O'Brien said.

"We like to give the title to people of extraordinary talents. Tate is one of the great poets of this country [and] Carde is one of the national figures" in entomological research, he said.

Spill stirs controversy in Congress

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sen. Alan Cranston and Rep. Mel Levine yesterday accused the federal government of hiding from the nation the possibility of a major oil spill and the ineffectiveness of clean-up technology.

The California Democrats blamed the Reagan administration for what they called a cover-up and asked President Bush to cancel further oil leasing off the California coast pending a complete review of the program.

Levine released internal memoranda from the Reagan administration on the proposed lease sale in northern California which he said revealed the likelihood of a major spill, other adverse impacts on the environment and an attempt to whitewash the information.

"The federal government refused to plan for a worst case spill scenario in Alaska and the result is one of the nation's worst enviromental disasters," Levine said. "Now we learn that government tried to deliberately cover up information about spills in California.

Levine said warnings from the Fish and Wildlife Service about offshore drilling risks in California were deleted from the final draft of a Minerals Management Service report.

Among the deletions, Levine said, were warnings that tanker traffic is at high risk operating in rough seas, current technology cannot in severe weather, and in calm weather it is only partly effective. Other allegedly deleted warnings were that the potential impact of assumptions that they could recover rapidly from oil inundation.

Levine presented a note from Steven Griles, then a top-ranking Interior Department official in charge of offshore development that said the warnings "could prove very damaging to this lease sale."

A spokesman for Interior Secretary Manuel Lujan, asked for comment, said Lujan had said "development would occur only in an environmentally and prudent manner."

A task force appointed by Bush to review the three California lease sales scheduled for 1990 will have its first meeting April 12.

"The task force might find that the lease sales should be stopped," said the spokesman, who asked not to be identified by name.

Environmental Protection Administrator William Reilly, meanwhile, told Congress that the massive spill could put the brakes on petroleum exploration there and in other areas — at least temporarily.

At the White House, press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said the president opposed any move to close the Alaska Pipeline, but said he did not know if the federal government had the legal authority to prevent it.

Alaska Gov. Steve Cowper has threatened to shut down the pipeline unless Exxon and other oil companies produce a better plan to deal with future oil spills.

Prof speaks on discovery of hidden city

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

A major archaelogical discovery last summer on the Tel Nami peninsula on the coast of Israel unearthed a 4,000-year-old "bronze harbortown" of ancient villages and gravesites, but the origin and unorthodox customs of the ancient peoples remains a mystery.

Michal Artzy, a professor of Maritime at the University of Haifa in Israel and a visiting professor at the University of Massachusetts, spoke last night to an audience of more than 60 at Amherst College about the excavation she has been leading since 1985.

Tel Nami, which juts only 300 meters into the Mediterranean Sea, was once thought to be a fishing village. But Artzy and several student-volunteers have discovered what they claim was once an international seaport frequented by Egyptians, Greek Mycenaens, Anatolians, and other Mediterranean inhabitants.

Artzy supplemented her lecture with an extensive slide show detailing the group's excavation of the crude remnants of 13th and 14th century buildings and burial grounds.

The 13th century stone constructions may have been destroyed by the Egyptians, who used the rubble to build a village to house mercenaries in the 14th century, Artzy said, speculating about the inhabitants.

"These people had to constantly battle salts, winds and sand," she said, describing the fierce coastal climate. "They must have really wanted to be there."

Delving further into the yellow sands, Artzy said the group uncovered several priceless bronze, ivory, and gold artifacts, as well as pottery and jugs.

"The amount of bronze in such a small area is very impressive," she said.

The crumbling foundation of one food storage area was also discovered, with stored raisins, grains and peas intact, she said. Artzy said a fire must have caused the roof to cave in, preventing the ancient peoples from reclaiming their provisions.

Although many of the jar-like coffins in the gravesites were robbed of jeweled tributes, presumably by ancient invaders, Artzy said the group was able to uncover several rings and weapons from the scant remains of several people of unknown origins.

Three intricately-carved incense burners were also discovered, but, according to ancient wall-carvings, may be associated with child sacrifices to the "gods," she said.

Artzy, accompanied by student volunteers from UMass, plans to lead her fifth excavation this summer, but declined to predict when the project will be completed.

"The sands are hiding many things," she said. "When I was asked years ago how long it would take, I said three years. I will not venture such a guess now."

Sororities plan safe rides

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Sororities at the University of Massachusetts are forming a safe rides program for members of the Greek area, according to Janet Meyers, a co-founder of the program.

Meyers, a member of Delta Zeta sorority, said the Pan-Hellenic Council conducted a training session last week in conjunction with the Health Education division of University Health Services.

"I think [the program] is going to alleviate the drunk driving problem," she said. "We shouldn't wait for a tragedy to happen."

The Inter-Fraternity Council has not yet approved the program, but is expected to do so at its next meeting, she said. The Pan-Hellenic Council has not set a starting date for the program, which would offer free rides to members of the Greek area who feel they are incapable to transport themselves, she said.

Christine Catalano, a staff assistant for the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, said the program would help reduce the frequency of harassment experienced by weekend bus drivers, particularly on the South Amherst bus route.

Ninety-nine sorority members have volunteered for the program, which Meyers said she hopes will begin before the end of this semester, she said.

Deidre Scott, a health educator at UHS, is directing the training program. Scott said she admires the efforts of these students because giving rides is "not the most glamorous thing to be doing on a Saturday night," she said.

Health Services could also benefit from a safe rides program, according to Margery James, an urgent care nurse at UHS. James said she hopes the Greek area will consider giving rides to people who come to Health Services for medical care and need to get home.

Meyers said support from the fraternities would be extra valuable because there should be someone in each car other than one female driver.

Money for gas and publicity of the program will come from the Pan-Hellenic Council, she said.

James said she knows there is going to be drinking and driving on weekends, "but if we can do something in a positive way, do something to help, then the entire campus community will benefit."

UMass student pleads innocent to charge

A 19-year-old resident of John Quincy Adams pleaded innocent yesterday in Hampshire District Court in Northampton to charges of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.

A pre-trial conference for the student was scheduled for May 11. According to University of Massachusetts police, the student was arrested Saturday at the Southwest Mall on a warrant stemming from a private complaint.

In the meantime, the student was ordered to stay away from the victim, the clerk of courts in Northampton said.

In other police reports:

- A 20-year-old Erving man and a juvenile were arrested Tuesday on charges of breaking and entering a motor vehicle with intent of larceny under $250 and malicious damage to personal property, police said.
- A woman reported the windshield on her vehicle was smashed while parked in the Campus Center garage on Tuesday.
- A plate glass window was reported broken Tuesday in the Hampshire Dining Commons, according to police. Damage was estimated at $150.

Survey: Central loudest on campus

By KERRY HERLIHY
Collegian Correspondent

Where do blaring stereos and noisy neighbors reign supreme at the University of Massachusetts? The answer may surprise you.

According to a survey conducted by Project Pulse last November, Central Residential Area is considered the loudest on campus, while Southwest was found to be the most frequently noisy. Sylvan is the quietest and least frequently noisy area, the survey showed.

Project Pulse, part of the Student Affairs Research & Evaluation Office, conducted the survey by phone, contacting 279 students.

Of 262 students surveyed from all five residential areas, 45 percent considered noise to be a problem in their residence hall; 52 percent said they could not study in their dorm because of noise, and 30 percent complained noise interfered with their sleep.

Joseph Zannini, executive director of housing services, said noise pollution is a concern within residential areas at UMass although attempts are made to control it.

"There are give and takes when living in the residence halls and a lot of compromising needs to be done. In general, students seem to be able to handle the level of noise in which they live," he said.

Zannini did, however, acknowledge there were "atypical disruptions," particularly in Southwest, which present problems for students wanting quiet.

Maura Cullen, residence director of John Adams Residence Hall in Southwest, said the noise problem in her area is influenced largely by the seasons.

> "In general, students seem to be able to handle the level of noise in which they live."
> – Joseph Zannini, executive director of housing

"When the weather starts to get nice," she said, "everyone wants to open their windows and crank their stereo. It gets to be a problem when there are students who want to get work done."

Desiree Russell, a Southwest resident, said "If you don't mind constant noise and vibrating walls when you are trying to sleep, then I guess it's no big deal. Personally it makes me mad."

Suzanne Fritz, an resident director in Northeast, said she does not see noise as a concern in her area.

"There are clear expectations of the residents and they are fairly strictly enforced," she said. "The place is not silent, but it is a place where everyone can live and have their rights upheld."

Sophomore Marci Sechtin, who lives in Northeast, said "I have lived in three different dorms [in Northeast] and noise has never been a problem. The most noisy things that I've encountered here is loud pipes and the janitorial crews."

Quiet hours, which are enforced in all residential areas, take effect in the late evening and early morning, when students are expected to keep noise to a minimum. Although 94 percent of the students surveyed are in favor of quiet hours, students indicated on the survey that quiet hours should be more strictly enforced.

Orchard Hill resident Gerry Kimball said "quiet hours are pretty much left up to the residents to enforce. If they want it quiet and it's not, then they have to speak up and say something."

Freshman Susan Curry said, "When I want it to be quiet, I go down the hall and tell people to be quiet. It usually works."

Zannini said "there are certain considerations which limit one's freedom and flexibility when living on campus. But it is also a lot of fun. Students, for the most part, comply with some normative of behavior. The noise level depends upon a mutual respect for others. One should be able to have fun as well as study because it is an important facet in life."

Black author urges changes

By JOSEPH L HILL Jr.
Collegian Staff

Economics, drugs and self-esteem are three issues African-Americans need to address in the near future if they are to survive in the next century, according to an author who spoke in the Campus Center Tuesday night.

Dr. Jawanza Kungufu, author of several books on Black history and culture, told a overflowing crowd of 200 that the future of Black America begins in the community.

"Now if you think that W.E.B. Du Bois, Malcolm X and Dr. [Martin Luther] King struggled to get you here so you can go downtown to work for IBM and Xerox, you are sadly mistaken," he said. "We want you to live here and go back to your community and begin to work for your race."

Kungufu said many African-Americans need to change their employee mentality.

"We'd rather work for IBM and Xerox and don't want to work for the race," he said, advising African-Americans to think like employers, not employees.

Collegian photo by Joseph Hill Jr.
Dr. Jawanza Kungufu

The author devoted much of his lecture to Malcolm X. He said the Black Power activist "knew who he was."

"Our problem is, we still do not know who we are," Kungufu said. "We do not know if we are Negro, colored, Black, African-American, African or American."

Kungufu said African-Americans face the problem of defining who they are. "Somebody else [defines] for us what beauty is. If America defines beauty as light skin, long hair and blue eyes, haven't they told you what ugly is? It must be the exact opposite."

According to Kungufu, there is a vast difference between African and Black history. He said the reason many Black youths are embarrassed to discuss slavery lies in where they decide to start their history.

"If you start in 1619, you start on a plantation and end up in a ghetto," he said. "If you start four million years ago, you start on a pyramid and end up being free."

"We are the only race that starts our children at a dismal era called slavery, every other race starts their children in a moment of glory," he said, adding that African-Americans need to start their history with the Egyptians.

Kungufu ended his lecture by giving seven points that "could change your [African-Americans] lives."

He said African-Americans should study African history; understand racism; understand diet and watch what they eat; understand what their talents are; understand economics, how money works and how to start their own business; do a time chart for themselves, in order to find out how they spend their time, and to put God first in their lives.

Chariots - not kegs - roll to support Jimmy Fund

By LARA DYMTRYSHYN
Collegian Staff

Delta Upsilon may have replaced a keg with a chariot, but fraternity members at the University of Massachusetts said one thing not changing is the desire to help the Jimmy Fund.

Tomorrow and Saturday, in conjunction with Amherst Police, 40 members of the fraternity plan to roll a homemade chariot from Boston to Amherst, a course covering 110 miles, according to Paul Carr, the fraternity's philanthropy chairman.

The annual event, now in its third year, was initiated by Donald Valade, a 1987 UMass graduate, and James O'Brien, a UMass senior. The fraternity decided to replace the keg with a chariot this year because it did want people associating the fund-raising effort with alcohol.

"It does not matter what we roll from Boston to Amherst, it is the fact that we are out there doing it to help others less fortunate," said Carr.

The fraternity has accumulated more than $5,000 over the past two years, he said. The donations benefit the Jimmy Fund, the primary fund-raising arm of the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute, a Boston-based research hospital dedicated to fight childhood cancer, Carr said.

The Jimmy Fund was started in 1948. Interest for it grew as a result of Ralph Edwards' national radio program Truth or Consequences. The Boston Braves baseball team, as the story goes, gathered around a hospital bed where a boy named Jimmy was dying of cancer. Today the Jimmy Fund is the official charity of the Boston Red Sox and the Massachusetts Police Chief Association.

According to the institute, cancer is the leading cause of death by disease in people between the ages one and 22. However, survival rates for childhood leukemia have jumped from five to 50 percent in recent years, and bone cancer, which in 1972 claimed 80 percent of its victims, is now cured in seven of 10 cases, according to the institute. In addition, childhood lymphoma, once untreatable, is now treatable in 75 percent of cases.

Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia, DU's consultant to the chariot race, said his predecessor first interested him in the cause in 1967.

"It [is] nice working as Delta Upsilon's consultant because unfortunately the fraternities and the police are usually seen on opposite ends," he said. "It's nice to work together for a common goal."

Author recounts tales from novel

NORTHAMPTON — Author Maxine Hong Kingston entered the five-college area barely noticed, but it probably will take a lot more cover for her to leave that way.

Appearing last night at Smith College's Wright Hall, Kingston entertained a crowd of 200-plus with selections from her latest novel, Tripmaster Monkey: his fake book. The author explained that the title was derived from a sixties term meaning guide of a spiritual or psychedelic journey. The novel is, as the author described, a "series of parties" shedding a new light on the conventional stereotype of the Chinese-American experience.

"People" Kingston said, "tend to see the Chinese immigrant as a hard worker who came to this country to make money. In my other books, I portrayed characters who were hard workers. In my new book I wanted to see what would happen if I gave all these hard workers a day off."

Drawing from the history of Chinese theater, Kingston's soft spoken voice recounted a series of comedic sketches in a manner born only to a natural story teller.

Kingston, the author of Woman Warrior and Chinamen, is scheduled to speak today at Johnson Chapel, Amherst College, at 8:00 p.m.

the amount.

The most common items stolen from the University Store are pens, pencils, greeting cards and health and beauty aids, according to Cummings.

"Shoplifters go after these items because they are easily concealed, but they are also the easiest to spot being stolen," he said.

Store employees often find empty toothpaste boxes or packages of pens with half of the pens missing, according to a student security guard who wished to remain anonymous.

Cummings said he has trouble understanding why students steal from the store. "They do weird things, they buy a load of stuff, and then steal a Chapstick," he said. "Maybe they do it for a challenge."

This is a costly challenge, he said.

"People are playing Russian roulette when they steal here," said Seaver. "We've had students taken out of the store in handcuffs."

The store management has several options when a customer is seen stealing. The police can be called, a complaint can be filed in Northampton District Court or if the pilferer is a student, that person may be turned over to the Student Judiciary.

"Most of the time, the case is turned to the Student Judiciary, but if we perceive it getting out of hand, or there's resistence by the student, we will take it to Northampton," Cummings said.

When the case is brought before the Student Judiciary, the student, for a first offense, is fined four times the cost of the stolen merchandise, or a minimum of $25, according to Chris McLellan, clerk of courts.

In 1988, the Student Judiciary collected $4,000 in fines, according to Kathy White, assistant clerk of courts. She said the money collected goes into a scholarship fund.

The student security guards are persistent, both catching shoplifters and turning them over to the proper authorities, the guard said.

the other residential area governments also put on events comparable to Bowl Day and do not resort to the Finance Committee for funds.

Student Government Association Treasurer Laura Filkins opposed the transfer, accusing the Orchard Hill government of bad planning.

"I feel that we should reward people who plan and we should not reward people who do not plan," she said.

Filkins added the Sylvan and Northeast Residential Area governments are spending $3,000 on their annual spring day events. Southwest Week, during which various bands perform, is costing $5,000, she said, questioning why Orchard Hill, one of the smallest areas, needed $5,600.

Dreyfus said Orchard Hill wants a big celebration this year because it is the area's 25th anniversary.

Commuter Area Sen. Brian Darling said to Lever: "So you're jealous because Sylvan doesn't get [$500 from the committee.]"

When Darling called for a vote on the matter, former Speaker Robert Fadel, who wanted to speak against the proposal but wouldn't be able to if Darling succeeded in moving to a vote, said, "Brian, You're killing democracy."

"I don't like democracy," Darling replied. The senate then voted on the proposal.

In other senate business:

Senate Speaker John Dunlap granted senator status back to Darling, Melina Sammy and Michael Partridge. Dunlap had removed their status because they missed Monday's deadline to apply for Senate committees.

Every senator must serve in a committee, according to the SGA Constitution.

Dunlap reconsidered his earlier decision because Partridge and Sammy missed the deadline due to illness.

$15,000 collected in honor of crash victim

By ALETHEA O'DONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

The smallest donation was a $1 bill folded in a plain envelope with no accompanying note — the largest gift was an anonymous donation of $1,000.

In little more than three months, more than $15,000 has been raised at Hampshire College in honor of Denice O'Neill, a Hampshire student who died on Pan Am flight 103.

The jet, on route from London to New York, exploded over Lockerbie, Scotland, in December, killing all 258 passengers and crew on board, and at least 17 others on the ground.

O'Neill, aspiring to be a doctor, was returning from an internship at a health clinic in Nigeria, where she was researching women and infant nutrition.

O'Neill's mother, Anne Gillis, initiated the fund after the college received an anonymous gift in her daughter's memory.

Cynthia Melcher, director of the Annual Fund at Hampshire, said a letter was then circulated to students and parents, asking for donations. Melcher said it was soon evident that alumni also wanted to give, and the outpouring of money in her memory began.

"While the majority of the money is from parents, we are also receiving a lot of gifts, which are smaller sums of $10 to $15, from alumni and students," Melcher said.

Melcher said parents have been generous for many reasons.

"What happened is every parent's nightmare," she said. "Also, because this was an international incident, it touches many people. Terrorism makes people feel very vulnerable," she said.

"Denice was very special," Melcher said. "It was evident that she was going to go on and do very special things. Everyone on campus knew her, she had a number of different friends, and belonged to groups with a number of different themes," she said.

Melcher said that students have been very responsive to the Denice O'Neill fund, which is not a scholarship, but rather a stipend for students like Denice working on their senior thesis in the areas of child development, anthropology, health or medicine.

"The students have been very enthusiastic, as well as faculty who knew Denice," she said.

"You can see in her friends that they've taken on Denice's energy," Melcher said. "They feel that she is with them, that she is not dead. There is such a powerful presence with her friends that they say that 'she will graduate with us.' "

Melcher said letters and donations arrive at the development office every day, and staff and administrators take turns opening the Denice O'Neill mail.

"I don't think anyone could have guessed at the time how overwhelming the response would be," she said.

A tale of SGA scapegoating

Hallelujah, brothers and sisters! We have cast a sinner from our midst!

With the publication of two Collegian articles last week, the public humiliation of former Commuter Area Government President Jay Festa has begun in earnest, while he is out of town and unable to defend himself. I only met him last January, but at that time, Jay had many friends and supporters in student government; not any more.

Al Arpad

According to the two articles, both based on a report issued by Student Government Association Treasurer Laura Filkins at the request of the Student Senate, Jay was involved in nearly $1,500.00 worth of "financial improprieties." About half of that bought capital equipment for the CAG office.

In student government jargon, "capital equipment" is any item costing more than $50. In this case, the equipment included computer game software, a coffee maker, and a radio-cassette player. According to Treasurer Filkins, "when every other RSO is suffering for funds and the Commuter Area Government buys a boom box, it's extravagant."

Although a memo issued last week by SGA Finance Co-chair James Smack, who shares an office with the Treasurer, stated that "there is quite an abundance of funds for Capital Equipment loans and grants available through the Finance Committee," many students will agree that some of the CAG purchases were extravagant. Myself, I think the large expenditure necessary to bring alleged comedian Dennis Miller to campus is extravagant; I think he's a stiff. But I'm not publicly accusing the show's backers of corruption.

Equally interesting, however, is Treasurer Filkins' comparison of the CAG with "other RSO's." The Commuter Area Government is, of course, not like most RSO's; it is a constitutionally recognized governmental body with a relatively large discretionary budget (about $30,000 each semester) and considerable autonomy.

Because its offices are located in the Student Union, the CAG receives much more scrutiny than the other area governments, as well as continual harassment from conservative students associated with the reactionary Minuteman. In fact, those same conservative students initiated the calls for an audit of CAG accounts in retaliation for Jay's persistent attacks on the vile and defamatory Minuteman. Expenditures for Tylenol and Nuprin, which were questioned in the audit, should be considered standard in any organization that deals regularly with the vexatious and detestable Minuteman.

Many of the purchases detailed in the report, such as $200.00 for magic markers, clearly warrant further investigation; but so far, Jay hasn't even been convicted by the SGA's kangaroo court in residence, the Student Judiciary, much less by a real court of law. As Senate Speaker John Dunlap told me in reference to the current controversy, "when you do an audit, you're going to find things that look rather strange if you have no programming experience."

Jay resigned his office because he couldn't afford to take a full course load, as required by the CAG constitution. As it stands now, he may never come back to face the right wing head hunters and former friends who are clamoring for a media spectacle. I wouldn't blame him, even if he's completely innocent.

For the record, I should point out that I was named in the initial audit report for picking up and distributing twelve dollars worth of posters for the CAG without proper authorization; that reference was dropped from the final report. Also, in fairness to Treasurer Filkins, I should point out that she is about to undertake an audit of all the other area governments, which should help put Jay's expenditures in perspective. As she wrote in the original CAG audit memo, "let he who is without sin cast the first stone."

Self-centered people deprive society

We live in a selfish environment. Most people in most cases will look out for numero uno before looking out for the other guy or the betterment of society. We live in a state of individualism and not collectivism. We cannot even call what we live in a "society", for Webster's definition of a society is 'Human beings collectively.'

Anthony Padovano

For us to live in a society, we have to make certain sacrifices for those less fortunate We also have to put up with inconveniences for the betterment of the community when the circumstances call for it.

This problem of selfishness and manic individualism has become even more acute as the $600,000,000 deficit run up by our illustrious governor Michael Dukakis, comes to a head. The issue of taxation shows clearly the selfish attitude of most people.

Before this crisis, we could afford to look out for ourselves because the state would pick up the tab for basic services. But now, the state can no longer do that.

The anti-tax lobby has forced legislatures to approach the deficit with the attitude of "no new taxes, and cut, cut, and cut." Legislators fear they will lose their jobs if they support new taxation. Because of this pressure cities and towns will, in real dollars, receive less state aid than they did last year and the budget crisis will be transferred to the smaller communities.

For the last few years, cities and towns have become spoiled because they have received huge amounts of state aid, allowing most of them to stay within the tax increase limitations set by proposition 2 1/2. Each year, they have received more money from the state than they were initially promised and they have gotten fat. Now that there is no meat left on the bone, everybody is crying because they can't have what they are used to.

Unless additional revenue is found, town services, such as road plowing, road repair, teaching services and police protection will have to be cut to deal with the problem.

But instead of doing what they should, i.e., overriding 2 1/2, towns are going to cut themselves to the bone and diminish the quality of life for their residents. All for the sake of not paying more taxes.

The classic example of selfish individualism diminishing the quality of life is the case of the town of Hull.

Last year, Hull was in a serious financial mess. After numerous meetings with town members and officials the only solution they could come up with was an override of 2 1/2. Before the vote, it was made crystal clear that unless the override was passed the school, among other things, would lose the ability to support any extracurricular activities. The vote failed and a few hundred kids were left out in the cold. The people in that town who voted against the override showed how selfish they were to the entire world. Kids who may have turned into the next Yitzach Perlman, or Jim Thorpe were robbed of the opportunity by their neighbors who were too cheap to dish another couple of hundred dollars a year out of their pockets.

Another example of selfishness is currently taking place around Boston and it doesn't have much to do with taxes.

Last summer, Boston and its suburbs decided it needed a new trash incinerator to take care of the area's growing trash problems. Mayor Ray Flynn recommended placing it in South Boston. If constructed and operated properly, the environmental effect of the incinerator would be no greater than burying garbage in the ground, as is done now. The town that housed the incinerator was to receive certain significant tax benefits making it financially attractive. But Senator Billy Bulger, who represents South Boston, said "You are not going to put that incinerator in my backyard." Presently, everybody is fighting to keep the incinerator out of their town while most agree a disposal area is needed.

As residents in a civilized society, we all have a responsibility to sacrifice for others and for our community. Otherwise, we will all be hurt by the lack of basic services.

Mr. Spock said it best in Star Trek II: "The needs of the many outweigh the needs of the few or the one."

Controlling the right to choose isn't democratic

The time has arrived for the Supreme Court to decide whether it should reverse its 1973 Roe vs. Wade abortion ruling. The majority of Americans believe that a woman should be allowed the right to a safe and legal abortion. However, the Supreme Court is allowing itself to be influenced by a very vocal minority: the pro-life people.

Most of the pro-life movement consists of zealous Christians who feel that they can cram their beliefs down everyone's throats. This movement is backed by such infamous, hypocritical individuals as the prostitute-patronizing Jimmy Swaggart and the adulterous, greedy Jim Baker. The pro-life people claim to treasure life; however, they don't have much regard for the lives of women who may be subjected to back-alley butchers or whose lives may be endangered by carrying pregnancies to term.

Think about the consequences of a Roe vs. Wade reversal. Frightening, to say the least. Making abortion illegal once again will prove that the government can control women's bodies. The government will be able to force women to carry unwanted pregnancies to term; women who want abortions will have to resort to the dangerous and unscrupulous practices of back-alley abortionists. A reversal of Roe vs. Wade could pave the way for other laws which control women's reproduction. The court could decide to adopt a one child per couple law, such as the one in China. Or, the government could decide who can and cannot have children — for example: it could rule that impoverished people, or those who carry genes for hereditary defects, cannot have any children. Sound familiar - sort of like Nazi Germany?

Women are considered to be the equals of men in our society. They are in many important political positions and the military. They are in many jobs which were considered male-oriented not too long ago (i.e. physicians, engineers, attorneys, police officers, mechanics, construction workers, mining, etc.) They should certainly be able to decide whether they want to continue a pregnancy.

My best friend is in the Marines, and she may someday have to fight and die for this country. She wants to fight for a democracy, not a nation which oppresses women and denies them the right to make their own choices. When a government denies women the right to control the size of their families, it ceases to be a democracy.

As a Catholic, I would not want an abortion. However, I believe that the choice should be there for women who do want abortions.

Lisa Hamelin is a UMass student

Civility means common courtesy

Civility, according to my trusty dictionary, means politeness, especially in a formal way. There was a Civility Day back in October that came about because of a racial brawl back in '86. The idea of a Civility Day is nice and definitely needed but it seems to have been just a one day event. Civility does not mean accepting everything that a group may say or pretending to agree with that which you oppose; it simply means common courtesy. We have all had experience with the concept of politeness because everyone at UMass must have been in kindergarten at some point in their lives. Back there we learned the basic rules of social behavior. We learned that hitting loses its appeal when you get hit back; we also found out that if everyone talks at once nobody gets heard. The problem is that this knowledge acquired so long ago has been lost by many students on campus.

For example, there is what basically comes down to a sticks and stones war between the liberal and conservative factions at UMass. There has ceased to be any identifiable argument, it has come down to a contest whose winner will be the side which can out-slander the other. Lack of civility on both sides has resulted in a crippled student senate and without leadership student rights are getting trampled across the board.

Another example of this problem occurs in many large lectures. Some groups of students decide that the lecture isn't dealing with anything that holds any interest to them so they start up their own discussions. This makes it even harder for people to get anything out of what probably is a boring lecture. It got so bad in economics class last semester that one day someone was actually rolling marbles down the aisle. It was really humiliating to have the teacher tell our class that we were responsible for the worst teaching experience she had ever had in ten years of teaching.

The hard part is thinking about how to deal with the lack of civility. Mandatory kindergarten for all incoming freshmen would probably be the most effective but the university can't afford that many crayolas. Instituting martial law and making uncivil behavior punishable by termination is always an option, as is dropping the whole pretense of civility and solving everything with combat. The best way of solving the problem is the most difficult. Show some consideration. That means not sending bomb threats to Republicans or Democrats; it means shutting up and falling asleep during a droning lecture; it means going against nature and being nice.

US should stay out of Nicaragua

While it is appealing to join the bandwagon over the recently forged bipartisan consensus which saw close to $50 million in non-lethal aid going to the Nicaraguan Contas, a.k.a. "freedom fighters," we should rethink what this pact means.

Just last month the presidents of five Central American countries, including the two chief players in the Contra debate, Honduras and Nicaragua, decided that by May they would "dismantle, repatriate, or relocate our of the area" 10,000 Contras in Honduras and their families. Again the US government is fanning the embers of carnage rather than saying yes to hopes for a fragile peace in that region. Even the term "humanitarian aid" is something of an Orwellism, a euphemism for bloodshed. A respected U.S. group, Witness for Peace, has noted that during the last year of so-called humanitarian aid for the Contras, there were 98 attacks on civilian targets by the Contras with 147 civilians killed, 281 kidnapped and 150 wounded. This in a country, Nicaragua, which has undergone decades of U.S. meddling in its affairs and a triumph over the brutal Somoza only in 1979 with 30,000 people killed. Isn't it time the U.S. government let the Nicaraguan people determine their own fate? A Sandinistan spokesperson was direct in assessing their view of the recent bipartisan agreement: "Any financing of the Contras that is not directed at their demobilization, repatriation or relocation is illegal under the Central American peace accords and runs contrary to area peace efforts." Big Brother from the North seems unable to resist manipulating a region that has been such a passive neighbor for so long. let's instruct our elected officials that it's time for the bully in Washington to become the lamb.

Crew team deserves better coverage

I am a member of the University of Massachusetts crew team. In the past, the sport of rowing has been unnoticed at the university; not because it has been unsuccessful but because nobody is exposed to it. One way to start giving the sport the recognition it deserves is through better coverage by the Collegian.

Since my arrival at the university, I have only seen one article about the sport and it didn't do it justice. The article merely skimmed over the sport and was also inaccurate. Increasing the public awareness of crew would be as easy as printing summaries of our races. We have them every weekend in April, leading up to the New England Championships and the Dad Vails in May.

The beauty of crew is that it's the true essence of a team sport. It is a sport where all eight rowers must act as one to be successful.

Crew has been a very successful sport here at the university. Just last year, we had two boats win gold medals in the Dad Vails, crew's equivalent of a National Championship competition. When you compare this to unsuccessful sports such as basketball, (which receive a half page of writing a day), where is the justice?

It wouldn't be hard to remedy the problem. By printing a little bit about crew in the paper, the Collegian could give the sport some recognition and exposure.

A toxic sandwich spread

While the struggle to clean up the Alaskan oil disaster continues, a similar tragedy within our own bodies is being ignored.

Darren Garnick

Countless gallons of oil are spilled in the human circulatory system everyday. The sludge-coated sea birds and the fish smothered in petroleum-sauce should pity us. When people swallow oil, it is not an accident. It is a conscious decision.

Some salmon are lucky enough to live in a oil-free environment. But their avoidance of pollution is only temporary, because oil will seep through their deathbeds. Healthy fish are caught in nets, ground up for human consumption, and later mixed with an oil called mayonnaise.

Mayonnaise is used mainly as embalming fluid on salmon and tuna fish sandwiches. The viscous substance also disguises itself in potato salad, salad dressing and party dip. Although it is a concoction of soybean oil and egg yolks, mayonnaise is not a food. It is an adhesive, a watery paste ideal for papier-mache projects.

I never understood why someone would want to desecrate a slice of bread by smearing mayonnaise on it. So I asked questions. The best argument I heard was "Dry tuna fish sucks!" Most mayonnaise-lovers are just as articulate in defending the slimy condiment.

The most apparent reason for drowning a piece of luncheon meat in glue is to cover-up the taste. Mayonnaise users don't like to be honest with themselves, refusing to accept food for what it is. By diverting attention away from their meals, they can suppress feelings of inadequacy. I could bore you with statistics linking mayonnaise use and an unhappy childhood, but I won't.

This is not an issue of style, but of substance. And the particular substance we are dealing with, mayonnaise, is sludge. Nothing more. Nothing less. Unfortunately, "icky" and "gooey" aren't enough to dissuade an eater with the "Try it, you might like it" mentality. Scare tactics are needed.

Choosing mayo is nutritional suicide. A content analysis for one tablespoon provides mealtime entertainment:

Protein 0 grams.
Carbohydrates 0 grams.
Fat 11 grams.

With 99 percent of the calories coming from fat, the laughs soon subside. Dr. Vincent Hegarty in Decisions in Nutrition, wrote: "As fat deposits accumulate in the channels of the arteries, blood flow is increasingly impaired, depriving the heart and other organs of oxygen and nutrients."

There you have it. Eat mayonnaise or breathe. You can't have both.

The Hellman's mayonnaise label reads that with less than 10mg of cholesterol per tablespoon, their product is a "low-cholesterol" food. The American Heart Association recommends a daily intake of no more than 150 mgs to reduce cholesterol levels in the blood. Mayonnaise eaters are obsessed with quantity. Since very few stop after one tablespoon, cholesterol quotas fill quickly. Cigarettes are a low-nicotine, low-carbon monoxide item, if you only smoke one.

Mayonnaise is culturally unappealing, and it kills. Friends don't let friends eat mayonnaise.

Darren Garnick is a Collegian columnist

The better part of lunch

Recently, I was debating with a friend one of the crucial issues of our times — Mayonnaise: is a sandwich still a sandwich without it?

Vanessa Baker

I say no. Call me a stuffy, right-wing conservative if you wish, but I must stand on the pro-mayonnaise side of this burning controversy. A sandwich must have a good coating of this essential substance, or frankly, ladies and gentlemen, it is not a sandwich. It is a travesty. Let's take a gander at this creamy taste sensation some would consider an optional spread.

As a child, I was brought up on homemade mayonnaise. My mother used to squeeze the oil out of soybeans with her own hands to make it. I can recall the mild, tangy taste to this very day. That creamy, silky-smooth texture, gliding pleasantly over my tongue, exciting every taste bud. I realized even at my young age that this was nor ordinary substance, but one that deserved my respect.

Let's talk turkey (and speaking of turkey — a couple of slices of rye, lettuce, tomato, and a generous heap of mayonnaise is the only way to devour this fowl). Mayonnaise is crucial. There are many pleasures in today's world, yet few attain the status of great. Mayonnaise, however, sets the standard.

Sadly, many people go through their entire lives without realizing this, foolishly taking for granted the gold that rests casually on their refrigerator door. I anticipate some skepticism, so allow me to address what life would be like without the ultimate sandwich spread.

Picture a construction worker, 50 stories up, on lunch break. As she opens her lunch-box to see what her husband packed that day, she is delighted to discover that he made an egg salad sandwich — her favorite. With alacrity, she tears away the cellophane and dives in for the first bite. As she begins to chew, she realizes there is something wrong. Looking back down at the sandwich in her hands, she screams. All the egg had fallen from between the two bread slices. Peering over the edge to see where her sandwich had landed, she suddenly loses her balance and tumbles down 50 stories. With a splat, she dies, still clutching in her hands two empty slices of wheat bread. A moment later, her lunch box falls aside her still form, spilling its contents: two napkins, an apple, and a small note that read: "Sorry about the sandwich, but we're out of mayo. Love, N."

A fictional scenario? Perhaps. But let me set the record straight: those people in the Miracle Whip commercial who got to extraordinary efforts to garner some mayonnaise for their late night snacks, are REAL people. I've met them.

A sandwich just isn't a sandwich. . .

There are those who would argue that mayonnaise, being so high in fat and calories, is not worth the taste because of its possible negative effects on health. To these four people, I say: Stop living your life on a scale! Enjoy being alive! Relish those few great pleasures offered in this world. Take a chance. Live life on the edge. Eat mayonnaise.

Blues Imperials got the gravy on Chicken LP

Chicken, Gravy and Biscuits
Alligator Records

RECORD REVIEW

Something's happening and it's coming out of Chicago on Alligator Records. Those who have given us K.C. Reed, the Kinsey Report and Hound Dog Taylor and the House Rockers are now responsible for the long overdue introduction of Li'l Ed and the Blues Imperials.

The introduction actually came in 1986 after the legendary first time recording session that became the band's debut album, Roughhousin', a rollicking barrel of blues worthy of more praise than most will tolerate.

Chicken, Gravy and Biscuits is the second album from these veterans of fourteen years of the Chicago blues scene, and their age shows through the fact that they've survived without compromising themselves. I saw them about a year and a half ago at the Iron Horse, while dribbling phlegm on a tofu lasagna for bloated yuppies. Li'l Ed and the Blues Imperials actually made that musical graveyard a thrilling place to be in, at least for a night. They rocked everything and everyone so hard that the owner was seen tapping a toe. At one point Li'l Ed - who only plays slide guitar ("I'm no picker . . . I want to stay rough and wild.") - was on the shoulders of rhythm guitarist Mike Garret, both of them playing the blues harder than a suicidal manic depressive. Together they wandered around a surprised and delighted imported beer drinking audience.

Backed by Kelly Littleton on drums, James "Pookie" Young on bass, and Mike's shoulders, Li'l Ed has the blues and too much talent to communicate them. As with most bands of this stature, a live performance is always greater than an album, but on Chicken . . . you feel you're in some dive on the West Side being fucked by what a little technology and a lot of heart and soul (and years of sweat) can do without the condom of mainstream mediocrity.

All the songs blend into each other; of special note is the cover of bluesmaster J.B. Hutto's "20/Alcohol" apparently recorded without rehearsal. J.B. Hutto is the uncle of Pookie and Li'l Ed and the album is dedicated to this man, Ed's chief inspiration and mentor.

"Can't Let These Blues Go" and "Got My Mind Made Up" tell you where this band's at; "Face Like a Fish" shows the self-effacing humor. But the music cries, sings and rocks for itself.

Someone other than me described their music perfectly; "They're dancing on the verge of musical chaos but never falling over the edge."

Brooks on: blues, work

By JOSEPH McGUIGAN
Collegian Staff

The following interview took place with Louisiana-born, Chicago-bred blues guitarist Lonnie Brooks, on March 30, at Pearl Street in Northampton.

Collegian: Have you ever gotten a real job or have you always supported yourself as a blues musician?
Brooks: Yes, I was doing it (work) 'cause I was just checking myself out. It was more like, see if I had to work . . . if I had to work could I do it, really do it. And I found out that I could work if I wanted to, and I stayed there longer than I really wanted to. It was almost like a bet that I couldn't work.
Collegian: Yeah
Brooks: Ya know? 'Cause I hadn't did nothing, I hadn't worked since I was about 23 years old.
Collegian: And how old were you then, your 30's or . . . ?
Brooks: No, I was about 42, 43 years old.
Collegian: So you went back to work.
Brooks: (laughs) I was no baby, yeah, I tried it you know, and couldn't you know, I proved that I could do it and then I started diggin it and I stayed there longer than I really wanted to because I got a chance to, it was a brand new thing for me. I got a chance to meet some daytime people. 'Cause all the people I knew was night people. People that comes out early . . . Collegian: Different shifts.
Brooks: Yeah! You know, and then I got a chance to learn . . . I hadn't worked since I was 23 years old.
Collegian: That's 20 years.
Brooks: Yeah, I'd say 19, 20 years.
Collegian: A man with a mission.
Brooks: (nods) And then when I started recording for Bruce, he told me, he said, "Well look . . . Collegian: Bruce Iglauer (founder of Alligator Records).
Brooks: Yeah, for Alligator . . . He said "You want to make records? You want to be an entertainer or do you want to work?" I said, "Well it don't bother me you know," said, "Which one is the best for me that's the one I'm going." So I decided to uh, to quit working and start back playing guitar.
Collegian: So when he approached you that was it?
Brooks: That was, yeah.

STOP PRESS: Blues legends Bo Diddley and "Mr. Superharp" himself, James Cotton, will be in the WMUA studio live at some point between 3 and 6 p.m. during the "Blame it on the Blues" show

Valley DJ's and the blues revival

By AL KAUFMAN
Collegian Staff

Everyone, at some time in their lives, sings the blues. But today, more people are singing them than ever before. Recent figures have shown that 2 to 10 thousand people listen to WMUA's blues segment from 3-6 p.m. every day. "Smokin' Joe" Roche, blues director and host of the Smokin' Blues and Rock Show on Wednesdays on MUA, thinks he knows why.

"Normal commercial radio gets boring after awhile," Roche said. "People get tired of the bull. The blues are real. The blues are intense."

"Blue Bill" Stepchew, host of Stormy Monday Blues on WMUA, agrees with Roche. "There was no talent in popular music for awhile," Stepchew said. "No new, interesting music coming out made people experiment more. They decided to give blues a try and found out they liked what they were hearing."

For Blue Bill, who sings and plays guitar for the band Blue Lunch, the love of the blues began at an early age. "I listened to Cream when I was younger, and I realized that all the songs I liked were written by people like Skip James and Howlin' Wolf. It just felt right to me," he said.

Smokin' Joe's love of the blues can also be traced back to early rock acts such as Eric Clapton and Led Zeppelin. He liked their music, but failed to realize it was the blues. "I knew nothing about the blues," he said. "I didn't get into the blues until I got up here (in the Pioneer Valley). Out here is a great scene for the blues. There's a lot of young, open-minded people who are willing to try new things."

Roche admits that the atmosphere in the Valley has opened him up to other styles of music besides blues. "I listen to other stuff I never thought I'd listen to before," he said.

Some of Roche's favorite local blues acts include Wildcat O'Halloran, who plays every Monday night at Sheehan's Cafe, and Sugar Ray and the Bluenotes. One of Stepchew's favorite local bands is Ed Vadas and the Fabulous Heavyweights, who will be opening for Bo Diddley this Friday night at Pearl Street.

"There's several good local bands that are caught in the Valley syndrome of being really good, but never leaving," Stepchew said. "But that happens all over the country."

Blue Bill, who runs the Blues Jam in which local bands can perform every Tuesday night at Pearl Street, thinks that the re-emergence of blues in the Valley reflects a national trend. "You see a lot more album releases and bands touring now," he said. "Old timers, like Eddie Kirkland and Lazy Lester, are touring and putting out new albums again because it's economically feasible." He credits Robert Cray and Stevie Ray Vaughn for the blues resurgance.

Stepchew is wary of the sudden blues popularity. "There's such an upsurge and so many people are coming to town, that people who support the blues can't support them all. Clubs won't be able to bring in the smaller acts. They'll stay with the safe, big names."

But for Stepchew, too much blues is better than not enough. "When I started in 1980, I had the only blues show on MUA. I think it's great that people can listen to it all week now."

UMass students to march

By SHARON WILKEY
Collegian Staff

When more than 400 students from the University of Massachusetts head south this weekend, they will be setting off for something much more significant than spring break.

The UMass students will join delegations from more than 400 colleges and universities across the nation Sunday to march at the Rally for Women's Equality and Women's Lives in Washington, D.C., according to the National Organization for Women.

Kate Nugent, an educator/advocate from the Everywoman's Center who helped to organize transportation, said, "The response has been so great, we've been able to fill four buses." More signed up for bus tickets, but the EWC was unable to charter a fifth bus.

The rally was organized by NOW to show support for the Equal Rights Amendment and legalized abortion, the rally is scheduled just 15 days before the US Supreme Court is expected to begin reviewing federal protection of the right to have an abortion. The court legalized abortion in 1973 with its decision on the Roe v. Wade case.

Molly Yard, president of NOW, said, "College and high school students — the young — have the greatest stake of all in this fight to keep birth control and abortion safe and legal."

Yard added, "They're the ones who must feel the greatest urgency to retain the legal right to decide when, and if, they will have children."

The local chapter of NOW, the pro-choice group People for Choice, and individual students will represent UMass.

More than 300 local residents have reserved spaces on buses provided by the UMass chapter of NOW and the EWC, according to spokeswomen from both groups. The buses are scheduled to leave UMass late Saturday night.

UMass conservative groups are not planning to go to Washington to protest the demonstration, according to W. Greg Rothman, a spokesman for the UMass pro-life group Students for Life.

Rothman said he expects pro-life activists to protest the march, but only as individuals and not as members of any conservative group from the University.

"But I do think it is a very bad precedent for individuals to think they can lobby the Supreme Court," Rothman added.

Local author to offer workshops

Leslea Newman says writing provides release for feelings

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Correspondent

An award winning Northampton author, who will offer writing workshops for women this April, says writing is therapeutic.

Writing brings out feelings, said Leslea Newman, who has received a $9,500 Fellowship Award from the Massachusetts Artists Foundation Fellowship Program in Boston for her poems about violence against women.

"Many times women are surprised by what they write," she said.

This belief has led Newman to establish two writing workshops for women: "What are you eating?/What's eating you?" and "Write from the Heart."

In the first workshop women write about their eating disorders, which brings recognition and validation of their diseases to themselves, according to Newman.

Kate Nugent, an educator/advocate from the Everywoman's Center who helped to organize transportation, said, "The response has been so great, we've been able to fill four buses." More signed up for bus tickets, but the EWC was unable to charter a fifth bus.

The writing exercises in the workshop approach many angles of eating problems such as body image, hunger, sexuality, clothes shopping, anger, and having needs, she said.

"It's a support group that uses the tool of writing to understand feelings about food, focusing on the feelings the writing brings, and sharing what was brought up through writing with the group," she said.

"We focus not on dieting or losing weight but on the women loving themselves as they are. This is a message most women haven't had from the diet companies and advertising," Newman said. "I encourage instead of discourage because I feel every woman has a story to tell."

Newman has told her story, too. She has published a collection of short stories titled "A Letter to Harvey Milk," and a collection of poetry, "Love Me Like You Mean It."

Leslea Newman

"I am continually writing poetry," said Newman, who has been published in the magazine Seventeen.

She is preparing a children's book, "Heather Has Two Mommies," and an anthology of poetry by Jewish women about their grandmothers, both to be published in the fall.

Newman, who has taught workshops in Northampton for four years, graduated from the University of Vermont in a self-created major of social services in creative writing and received a certificate of poetics from the Naropa Institute, in Boulder, Colorado.

She published a novel in 1986, "Good Enough to Eat," which is the story of a 25-year-old bulimic coming to terms with her problem and her sexuality.

"I write for six hours a day," Newman said. "A teacher once told me, 'If you set aside 15 minutes a day to write, by the end of the year, you have a novel.' "

Her workshop, "Write from the Heart" for women writers is scheduled to begin the week of April 10.

The workshop is for a range of women writers. It will include writing exercises that teach elements of fiction and poetry.

"They start by unlearning what they had learned in schools that taught them one way to write," Newman said. "I believe you should let whatever's going to happen between the pen and paper happen."

She said the best way to learn to write is to read, write, and listen.

"The most important thing is to have faith in your work no matter what anyone else tells you," she said.

"You have to make writing a priority in your life. Don't think about publishing at all but write for the sheer joy of writing."

Letters sent to protest sexist images

By SARA GALER
Collegian Staff

A national organization, founded two years ago in Amherst, is working to make sexist portrayals of women obsolete.

Athletes for Equality is a movement working to obtain fair and equitable media coverage of women, according to AFE President Beverly Smith.

"Athletes for Equality protests any sexist advertisements in general, not just those that are sports oriented," said Beth Berry, the Amherst AFE facilitator.

As one activity, AFE has launched a letter writing campaign to Sports Illustrated, claiming the magazine portrays women unfairly. Berry said the letters protest the Swimsuit Issue (Feb. 1989), and suggest alternatives, such as a women's sports issue.

"There needs to be more coverage of female athletes," Berry said.

Linda Verigan, a spokeswoman for the magazine's letters department, said Sports Illustrated has received quite a few letters from AFE. Verigan added that AFE has been sending the letters of protest for about 18 months to two years.

AFE received a reply letter from Sports Illustrated. "The letter from Sports Illustrated was very polite," Berry said. "They said they would take the idea into consideration."

Berry noted any immediate change in the format of Sports Illustrated's Swimsuit Issue is not likely.

> "There needs to be more coverage of female athletes."
> – Beth Berry

Verigan said Sports Illustrated acknowledges AFE's viewpoint. "We understand that some people don't care for the Swimsuit Issue, and we certainly respect their opinion. However, we don't feel the Swimsuit Issue exploits women, or that it's in poor taste. It's not pornographic in any way," she said.

Sports Illustrated takes any suggestions, ranging from more coverage of female athletes to more coverage of men's swimsuits, Verigan said.

AFE has been more successful convincing companies smaller than Sports Illustrated to change their ad campaigns, Berry said.

Another AFE campaign involved an advertisement for Palm-Aire, a Florida-based travel company, Berry said. The ad implied women visited executive conference centers only as bored wives of businessmen, she said.

"In no way does it acknowledge the possibility of women as executives," Berry said. "In response to our protest, they cancelled the ad and fired the advertisers that created the concept."

"The best response I got was from my insurance company," she said. "I had written them in protest of a specific ad. They wrote back to me and said how they would try to be more responsible in their advertising."

Berry said companies will always respond to legitimate complaints.

"It doesn't matter if it's part of a campaign or if the protest originates on a more personal level," she said. "What matters is that our voices are being heard."

France's 'abortion pill' still distant prospect

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Staff

The pro-lifers are denouncing it as using abortion as birth control, while the pro-choicers are hailing its existence and pushing for its legalization in the United States.

RU-486, "the abortion pill," has been credited in several publications with reducing the physical and mental tramua associated with abortion by making the need for surgical abortions unnecessary.

HEALTHWATCH

The pill blocks the fertilized egg from attaching to the uterus wall, preventing pregnancy from continuing.

Carol Florence, a spokeswoman for the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development in Washington, D.C., said, "RU-486's legalization really depends on the demands of our society in the future."

She said controversy between pro-lifers and pro-choicers was stirred when the media first began reporting on RU-486.

"At this point, no pharmaceutical company is willing to put it's stockholders or its integrity on the line in order to manufacture the pill," she said.

Developed in the early 1980's in France, and manufactured publicly in 1986, the pill remains under patent and is available in France only by prescription. Its availability in the United States is not expected any time soon.

Susan Cruzan, a spokeswoman for the Food and Drug Administration in Washington, D.C., said in order for RU-486 to be manufactured in the United States, the patent must first be sold to a company in this country.

But the National Institute for Child Health and Human Development hasn't gotten any bids from manufacturers for RU-486, said Florence. "It's not surprising, considering the controversy surrounding the issue," she said.

And even if American drug companies choose to manufacture RU-486, drug development takes more than eight years, Cruzan said. Legalization depends on RU-486's effectiveness and safety, she added.

Florence said the National Institute for Child Health and Human Development has been researching the pill's effectiveness for five years.

The majority of research done at the institute has centered around the development of RU-486's effectiveness against Cushing's syndrome, breast cancer, glaucoma, and improving fertility, Florence said.

"I do know that there are other institutions, like the National Cancer Institute, testing the pill now, but I really don't know if it will ever be legalized," she said.

Blues remain fresh

A couple of weeks ago, WMUA's Stormy Monday Blues host Bill Stepchew raised a question of deep concern, and one could sense some soul-searching as the looming conundrum passed from his mouth, to the mike and out over the air-waves.

The question was one regarding the current state of blues music, and its performers and performances.

To paraphrase the question, he wondered if people were getting sick of the blues. Perhaps, according to "Blue Bill", " . . . there's so many blues acts in the Valley that they (the public) can't afford to got to all of them." According to the query, "Perhaps we've had too much of a good thing in the past few years. People just aren't able to go to all the shows. They can't support the shows in the Valley."

Apparently, "It was trendy in the last 10 years, and now the trend seems to have passed." With the current multitude of blues artists, there is a lack of patronage for many of the acts that are at the forefront of the blues genre.

Those who follow blues music seriously are ecstatic with the increase in blues performances at our local venues, and that influx has helped to give everyone exposure, opportunity and a chance.

Joseph McGuigan

So it may seem that blues music has become passe, Bill. But after 10 years as a DJ, I'll bet you haven't heard a blues song that's been played to death. The blues just aren't on that scale. Just keep on giving them a chance.

Joe McGuigan loves the blues

Student paper rates teachers, draws fire

MEDFIELD (AP) — A pair of Medfield high School students published a newspaper that drew attention for its well-written stories about health and drug issues and an interview with the author of a novel that became a smash movie "Who Framed Roger Rabbit?"

But they drew even more attention when they rated 26 teachers on a scale of zero to five in their maiden issue last Friday.

"It hurt a lot of people; faculty, students, and parents ... One teacher was hyperventilating. I thought I would have to call a doctor," said Tassos Filledes, the school principal.

Jesse Jacobs and Marcel Sarmiento created The Gravy after John Moretti, the vice principal, refused to allow Jacobs to write a story for the school paper on a survey of student drug use.

But the two seniors told Middlesex News that their survey was not intended to be a personal attack against the faculty.

"It just shows what some kids thought about the teachers at a particular time," Sarmiento said. "If we took another survey today, their thoughts would probably be different. We had no intention of hurting anyone."

The lowest rating issued was a 1.4 to an unnamed teacher, but Robert Santoro, president of the Medfield Teachers Association, said his colleagues were not concerned with their position on the scale.

"It wasn't just the people at the bottom of the list, it was everyone," he said. "I didn't hear anyone say, 'I should have gotten more points than this guy.' It was the concept of rating teachers in public they thought was bad and unfair."

Moretti was singled out in a story about "neurotic power figures" who run the school and he was lampooned in an ad that shows his picture on a beer bottle. Jacobs and Sarmiento consulted the American Civil Liberties Union before running the ad, which was labeled "Parody."

Moretti said he doesn't expect to win any popularity contests as the school's chief disciplinarian, and he doesn't lay all the blame for The Gravy's fallout on Jacobs and Sarmiento.

"I think what we have here are two young men who are somewhat innocent and naive, who may be getting bad advice," Moretti said. "Some of the stories were very good, and the layout was [attractive]. But I think someone told them that evaluating teachers and staff was not going to hurt anyone."

For their part, the fledgling publishers plan to go to press again in May, but they declined to say what surprises the next issue may hold.

Rugby team to split up squad

The University of Massachusetts rugby team will split up Saturday, with the first and third sides going to West Point to take on Army and the second and fourth teams going to North Adams State.

Of the two games, Army is the greatest challenge. Last year in the season opener, Army beat a young and inexperienced UMass team. Saturday, the UMass ruggers will be looking for "redemption," as coach Francis Buttle put it.

"We're looking forward to it, without a doubt," prop Eric Olsen said. Olsen also stressed that the team was trying to get in better physical shape for Saturday's match.

Women's tennis to face UConn

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team will be facing two hurdles today when the University of Connecticut visits the Upper Boyden Courts at 3 p.m.

The first is a powerful UConn team and the second is the possible loss of No. 1 singles player Christine Willse.

Willse, according to UMass coach Mike Hugsted, is questionable with a wrist injury. "If she's out, it could change everything," Hugsted said.

The final home match will feature one of the strongest opponents UMass will face all season.

UConn overwhelmed UMass in the Fall and it won't be any easier this time around. Hugsted's young squad needs to mature fast today to score the upset.

UMass will also need good pitching today, as Hartford has a some of good ones of their own, the best being Keith Wiley in Rikeman's opinion.

"They have some great pitching," said Rikeman. "They are really deep."

Another star for Hartford is pre-season All-American Jeff Bagwell.

"He is a very good hitter," said Rikeman. "He plays the corner well. He was a top hitter in the Cape League last summer."

Overall, Hartford shouldn't present too much of a problem for the Minutemen provided UMass competes up to its potential. The Hawks are 3-6-1 after losing four of their last five. They are a decent team though and for UMass to win it will require a higher level of play than it showed at St. Joseph's.

"Beating them will give us confidence," said Rikeman. "We will have to play harder to beat them."

Contest winners named

Seton Hall gave them a scare, but the Michigan Wolverines won the national championship and, at the same time, decided the winners in the Collegian NCAA hoop contest.

The overall winner in the contest was Frederick Kleiman, who finished with 110 points.

Tom Sassi finished in second place with 102 and Karen Bourque took third with 97.

Nicholas Forsyth-Fandetti (96) and Steve Kingman (93) rounded out the top five.

The five people mentioned above can come to the Collegian office, located in the basement of the Campus Center, Rm. 113, to pick up their prizes.

Pretend you're going into town and bring an ID, because we will card you to make sure you're really you.

To all the non-winners, the Collegian would like to thank you for your participation. We had a groovy time counting your ballots.

UMass, though, is fresh off its easy victory over St. Bonaventure on Saturday. "The opening win was good for us, but we will need a total team effort to beat UConn," Hugsted said. "The team is ready to play and the morale is high."

If Willse does not play, the UMass lineup will be altered with everybody moving up a spot on the ladder.

Hugsted notes that although its very early in the season, this is a very crucial match. "A win would really propel this team," he said.

D is the key as Gorillas beat Brown, 15-6

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Jim McAleavey (30) looks on as Paul Ganci (11) leaps in the air after scoring a goal during the Gorillas' romp over Brown yesterday.

There's an old saying that goes, "If you score you may win, but if the other team doesn't score, you'll never lose."

Yesterday the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team took to the defensive, as goaltender Sal LoCascio and his supporting cast pitched a shutout in the second half. From there, the offense took over as the Gorillas blitzed New England rival Brown, 15-6 at the Boyden Hill. UMass has now won 21 straight against New England teams, dating back to 1985.

Balancing off the defensive play was a stellar eight-goal effort from Scott Hiller. The junior attack came into the game with just seven goals in the first five games.

"The beauty of this team is that we're not a one-man team," UMass coach Dick Garber said. "You try to gear for one man and five more can kill you."

Others had been picking up the slack. But seeing Hiller, still the primary Gorilla threat, crank it up was a big boost.

"It's about time. I've been waiting for a good game," said Hiller, who had his eight on just 14 shots. "It had a lot to do with my confidence. I only had a few shots against Cornell and St. John's, but I finally got it going."

The eight goals topped the seven goals that he scored in 1987 in his collegiate debut against Delaware. It may also be the most he's ever scored, including high school. "They used to take me out after six goals," he said of his pre-collegiate days.

But Hiller needn't worry yesterday. He was firing on all cylinders, as was the rest of the team. Leading just 8-6 at the half, the Gorillas (5-1) played possessed over the final 30 minutes, totally baffling the Bruins (4-3).

UMass needed the performance to shake the doldrums of a tough loss against Cornell, followed by an OK win at St. John's.

"After the Cornell game we were down, we felt we should have won," Garber said, "and we were shocked at how St. John's played. We weren't that good in the first two games, but today we said 'Let's see how we can play.'"

The Bruins got a heavy dose of what UMass can do when it's at the top of its game. Brown was able to keep up for most of the first half, as senior attack Jamie Munro got his team on the board just 19 seconds into the contest. UMass rattled off three straight, the first two by Hiller and the other by Paul Ganci (four goals) to lead 3-1 just 2:35 into the game.

The Bruins rallied behind Munro and Jay McMahon to take a 4-3 lead after one, and it didn't look like defense would be a factor. Goals by Hiller and Ganci gave UMass the lead back before Munro's third goal tied it with 8:59 left in the half.

What happened next may have swung the game totally into UMass' hand. On a clearing pass, LoCascio misfired and was picked off by Munro near midfield. LoCascio was way out of the net and Munro had a wide open goal, but bounced it over the net.

With that, the Hill crowd of 1735 had itself a whipping boy for the rest of the game. Cries of "Jamie, Jamie" rained down whenever he touched the ball, and Munro couldn't have disappeared more if he'd driven back to Providence right then and there.

"Soudan clocked him, and then we alternated [Tom] Bonnet and [Eric] Muench to take him out of the game," Garber said.

A pair by Hiller and a single tally by Jim McAleavey (five assists) around a Sam Jackson goal closed the half at 8-6.

Little did anyone know that Brown would never score again. The defense stiffened up, and LoCascio made several great saves to keep the Bruins off the board.

The Gorillas turned up the physical game, with Munro being a favorite target. When a Tim Soudan hit cleaned Munro's kitchen on the far sideline, the Hill crowd went nuts.

"We like the physical game. When the Hill gets going, the team gets going," Soudan said.

Three more by Hiller, two by Ganci and single tallies by Rob Codignotto and Vince D'Angelo finished the scoring.

As it turned out, none of them were really needed. LoCascio picked up the majority of his 19 saves after intermission, with the defense keeping the heat off for the most part.

Baseball, softball to travel to Hartford this afternoon

• Minutemen look to get back on track

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Staff

After this weekend's disappointing split with St. Joseph's University, the University of Massachusetts baseball team is anxious for a chance to prove how good it really is. It will get the chance to do that today against the University of Hartford at 3 p.m. at Hartford.

"It will be good for us to get back out on the field against Hartford," said assistant coach Bob Rikeman. "Against St. Joseph's we didn't really play as well as we should have played. We played on their level of the competition instead of playing on our level. Hartford should give us the chance to play up to our level."

Rikeman, the pitching coach, and assistant coach paul Archey might end up at the helm today due to the fact that head coach Mike Stone's wife is reportedly in labor. They should have no problem if they do, since they already have an idea of what they're going to do today.

Rikeman said Jerry Creamer, a transfer from the Florida Gators who pitched in the college World Series last year, will probably get the start for the Minutemen with Dan O'Leary coming in for relief.

"We want Creamer to go as long as he can go," said Rikeman. "We also want to get O'Leary in and get him some work."

One change might be made in the field, moving Steve Kern to third base and Brian Donovan to first.

"It's just a defensive move," Rikeman explained.

Despite the 7-8 record UMass has going into the game, the Spring so far has shown how much young talent the Minutemen have picked up.

"Glen DiSarcina, our shortstop, has already proven he can make big league defensive plays and that he can hit well," said Rikeman. DiSarcina, like designated hitter Drew Comeau, is following in the footsteps of an older brother. Glen's brother Gary, a UMass shortstop, was drafted by the Angels last summer.

Other entries in the pleasant surprise catagory include freshman outfielder Brian Bright, who leads the team with four home runs so far this season, and a pair of freshman catchers, Derek Dana and Lou Olivieri.

"Their defensive catching is excellent," Rikeman said. "They have had problems throwing runners out but behind the plate they are doing a very good job."

• Minutewomen to battle Hawks twice

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The April showers have brought mixed blessings for the University of Massachusetts softball team. When Tuesday's scheduled doubleheader against URI was scrubbed, the Minutewomen smiled at the extra time to heal a flurry of bumps and bruises.

Then again, according to coach Elaine Sortino, softball skills are difficult to tune in an indoor gym such as Totman, which the Minutewomen have been calling home all spring.

"Right now, we need to play," said Sortino, whose team played some of their sharpest ball of the year in a pair of wins over top-ranked Princeton and UConn last Sunday. "The longer we have to wait, the tougher it is going to be for us."

Well, by this afternoon, the waiting should be over. UMass is scheduled to travel to the University of Hartford for a doubleheader, beginning at 2:30 p.m.

Though the Lady Hawks claimed 12 wins in their most successful season ever last year, they find themselves 0-4 and undermanned early on this spring. First-year coach Irene Mach's roster lists just 13 players, and is especially thin in the pitching ranks. Tracey Ciosek threw both losses last weekend at Yale, a 6-5, 5-0 washout, then absorbed a pair more Tuesday afternoon at Central Connecticut State University.

Last year UMass beat the Lady Hawks twice in Amherst, 5-0, 6-2.

The rest has given UMass freshman pitcher Holly Aprile some extra time to heal her right eye, which took five stitches between the Princeton and UConn contests last weekend. Aprile returned, by the way, to sling a six-hit, four-strikeout, 3-1 victory over UConn. The effort earned her Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week honors.

"She was only 60 to 65 percent," Sortino said of Aprile's performance Sunday. "But she pitched an outstanding game, I think it was a great choice."

Extra bases: Thanks to Tuesday's rainout, the beginning of the Atlantic 10 season was pushed back to this weekend.

UMass will play four games at Totman, meeting St. Bonaventure University for a doubleheader beginning at noon Saturday and Penn State University for a noon doubleheader Sunday.

Weekend forecast: Raindrops continue to fall on our heads — 30 percent of the time. High 55-60.

UMass creates $3 mil. reserve

By BETH GATELY
Collegian Staff

A $3 million dollar reserve fund has been created to help soften the blow of next year's state budget for public higher education, according to Provost Richard O'Brien.

On Wednesday, the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees voted for a reduction in force at the UMass-Boston. The reduction allows trustees to eliminate non-professional positions without prior notice, O'Brien told members of the faculty senate yesterday.

"The employees must realize that by July 1, they may be without a paycheck and job," he said. "I hope to God this doesn't happen here."

O'Brien said campus-wide, administrators were asked to spend 97 percent of their fiscal year 1989 budgets. In academic areas, the average reserve is 1.6 percent. The administration was requested to disburse between 3 percent and 8 percent less than they did in FY 1989, according to O'Brien.

An ambassador program has been implemented between UMass and alumni and others with interests in the University, according to Deidre Ling, vice chancellor of University and development.

"The program will serve as a two-way exchange of information," Ling said. "There is a vast sundry of things to work on, [including] visibility and support for the University."

Franklyn Jenifer is scheduled to appear at the next senate meeting. He will be asked to present the senate's view to the Board of Regents, O'Brien said.

Hoyle: Many alarms 'malicious'

Amherst deputy fire chief says students must police themselves

By TOM CIAMPI
Collegian Correspondent

Nearly two of three false alarms the Amherst Fire Department responded to last year at the University of Massachusetts were pulled "maliciously," a trend expected to continue this year according to the senior fire prevention officer for the Division of Environmental Health and Safety.

Keith Hoyle said that in fiscal year 1988, 128 of 197 false alarms were determined "malicious pulls." An additional 55 were considered "accidental pulls" (no malicious intent) and 14 were caused by system malfunctions.

Malicious pulls are defined as fire alarms pulled as a prank, or with an intent to disrupt activity, he said.

"The malicious pulls are recognized by all involved to be instituted in most cases by friends of students living in the dormitories, not by residents themselves," Hoyle said, adding that most occur on weekends.

Pulling an alarm "maliciously" is considered a misdemeanor under Massachusetts General Laws, and is punishable with up to a $200 fine and/or a year in prison, he said.

Hoyle, who is also deputy chief of the Amherst Fire Department, said three residence halls — John Adams, Coolidge, and Van Meter — are where malicious pulls occur most frequently. He said in FY 1988 there have been 19 malicious pulls in John Adams, 16 in Coolidge, and 10 in Van Meter.

Hoyle said between July and December 1988, the first half of FY 1989, 16 additional malicious pulls occurred in John Adams and Coolidge alone.

Residence directors agree with Hoyle that little can be done to prevent the pulls. Julie Elkins, John Adams RD, said, "there are about 50 fire alarms in this building, and little pattern of when and where they are pulled, other than that many occur at" 3 a.m. or 4 a.m on weekend mornings.

Hoyle said that the end result is students policing themselves. "I believe that everyone knows it's not correct to pull alarms maliciously."

One fire truck, two police cruisers and one physical plant truck are required to respond to all alarms, he said.

Larry Moneta, associate director for Residential Education, said a student caught pulling an alarm maliciously faces, at minimum, a deferred removal from their residence hall, and involvement in subsequent infractions means removal from the dormitory.

Moneta said students can also be required to attend the five-hour Fire Safety Discipline Education Program and follow that with a project, usually a paper.

Hoyle said even in dormitories where frequent false alarms occur, most students take the alarms seriously, although two residents in John Adams disagreed.

Karen Heavey, who lives on the 20th floor, said, "I know most of the alarms are false because they always seem to occur on weekends." William Walsh, a resident of the 10th floor said students leave the building only "because if they don't they are fined."

Rally to kick off GLB Week today

A noon rally scheduled for today on the steps of the Student Union Building will start the sixth annual University of Massachusetts Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Awareness Week.

The rally, entitled "20 years since Stonewall," is one of many daily events scheduled for the week long celebration ending on Friday, April 14. Stonewall is the name of a gay bar in New York City repeatedly raided by police. Subsequent protests by the gay community prompted some of the first media coverage of gay, lesbian, and bisexual concerns.

Comedian Kate Clinton is scheduled for 8 p.m. at Chapin Auditorium at Mount Holyoke College. Tickets are available free of charge. For more information, call 545-4824.

Other Awareness Week events planned for today include coffee socials for undergraduate and graduate students.

During the weekend, workshops as well as entertainment will be offered. An "Anti-Homophobia Boogie" is slated for 9 p.m. tomorrow in the Student Union Ballroom, and a GLB Entertainment Extravaganza is planned to follow Sunday's workshops.

The workshops, including ones on AIDS and the Massachusetts Gay Rights Bill, will be held throughout the afternoon Saturday and Sunday in the Campus Center.

Minuteman apology draws skepticism from students

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Minuteman staff members faced more than 100 angry students in an open meeting last night to offer apologies for items printed in recent issues of the conservative newspaper, claimed by some to be racially offensive.

The meeting, held in the Campus Center, was originally held to discuss ways to combat the Minuteman, was sparked by a recent item printed by the conservative journal that featured a photo of Student Government Association Sen. Anuj Bhogilal, a Southeast Asian. The photo was altered so that the senator was holding a bowl and appeared to be begging for assistance.

Many Southeast Asian students said the mock advertisement was a "racist attack" because it ridiculed the famine conditions existing today in many Asian nations.

Led by contributing editor Paul McGonnigal, Minuteman staffers apologized for offending members of the community, and said the staff is striving to become a better conservative political journal.

But McGonnigal refused to say if he thought the advertisement was racist and balked when Bhogilal called for the resignation of its entire editorial board.

"For the degree to which we have offended people — we apologize," he said. "We are not a bunch of racists. Call it ignorance, call it what you want, we are sorry for that."

McGonnigal said the advertisement was an attempt to offend Bhoghilal's political ideals, and was in no way an effort to make a conscious racist attack. Bhogilal often voices opposition to conservative senators' efforts in weekly student senate meetings.

North testifies he was told to keep quiet

WASHINGTON (AP) — Oliver North, testifying in his own defense, said yesterday that Reagan administration superiors told him "not to tell anybody" about his role in funneling aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

North took the stand shortly after George Bush was identified in court as an intermediary in President Reagan's secret plan to aid the Contras.

North, who faces a dozen charges in connection with his role in the Iran-Contra affair, said, "I was particularly admonished" to keep secret "that another country was providing millions of dollars to help the Contras." Saudi Arabia supplied some $32 million dollars to help the Contras, beginning in mid-1984.

Under questioning from his lawyer, the former White House aide depicted himself as a Marine officer with plans to take command of a battalion at Camp LeJeune when top officials in the Reagan administration enlisted him to run the secret Contra operation in 1984.

North testified in his own defense after his attorneys read into the record a lengthy account of the Reagan administration's efforts to keep alive the Contra struggle against the leftist government of Nicaragua.

The account, a legal "admission of fact" read to the jury with the agreement of the prosecution, said Bush personally told the president of Honduras in 1985 that extra aid was being funneled to his country as payment for helping the Contras.

The account also said a representative of Panamanian military leader Manuel Noriega offered in a meeting with North to assassinate the Sandinista leadership in Nicaragua.

Asian festival begins tonight

CC sight of celebration

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Hundreds of students are expected to fill the Campus Center auditorium tonight for dancing and cultural shows as the largest minority group on campus presents its sixth annual Asian night.

Deborah Lee, president of the Asian American Students Association, said the six-hour event, beginning at 7 p.m., is a "celebration" of the many different Asian cultures, ranging from Korean and Cambodian, to Indian and Chinese.

"We want to show people our culture in a fun way," Lee said. "It is one thing that draws the Asian students together and eliminates the gaps on campus."

The talent show will feature an Indian violinist, a Korean dance, hula dancing by Hawaiian exchange students, an exhibition of the traditional costumes of various Asian countries and demonstrations of Tae Kwon Do and Kung Fu by University of Massachusetts students, she said.

The event will also offer a fashion show of spring clothing donated by local merchants, Lee said. The show is choreographed by three Asian students in an attempt to demonstrate the variety of talents in the Asian population, she added.

The celebration is also an effort to create a bond between the many Asian populations on campus because, although they constitute the largest minority group, Lee said academic and cultural support services for Asian students are virtually nonexistent.

Survivors, activists tell nuclear horror stories

By SCOTT ROE
Collegian Correspondent

To most people the death and destruction that occurred when the United States dropped two atomic bombs on Japan in 1945 is only something to be read in history books.

But about 70 people got a first hand account Wednesday night in Hasbrouck, when they attended a talk about dangers nuclear weapons pose. The talk was given by survivors of the Japanese bombings, and American "Downwinders," people living near nuclear weapon manufacturing plants.

Tomomasu Takeshita was a student and soldier in Hiroshima when the United States dropped the first atomic bomb on Aug. 6, 1945. At times speaking with a translator, Takeshita said he and others suffered enormously during the day of destruction.

"All of a sudden a sound like a shower, and air became fire. Everything burned — my hands burned and my face burned," he said.

The blast from the bomb killed or injured over 160,000 people and destroyed buildings in a four square mile grid. According to Takeshita, many people were badly burned and "their faces and noses were so swollen that they couldn't even open their eyes."

"I saw young children coming back from the school . . . without hair and [with] all theirs clothed burned off," he said.

Mary Butters, an American "Downwinder," said she also felt the effects of nuclear weapons. Butters, who grew up in Utah, said that as a child she had to take thyroid medication to combat the effects of radiation that came from the Nevada nuclear bomb test site.

"You don't need to be in the epicenter of a bomb blast to suffer the consequences of the bomb," she said.

Butters said that communities near nuclear weapons plants report higher levels of cancer and cancer-related deaths. She said the people who run the plants and the government are responsible for the safety and welfare of the people of the United States.

"I think this is everybody's problem. . . because we all live downwind, we all live downstream, or upstream" from nuclear weapons plants, she said.

Michael Lowe, a member of Greenpeace, said the US Department of Energy has poured millions of gallons of toxic waste and radiation-tainted water into the creeks and streams in his home state of South Carolina.

"We in this country must begin to advocate that we clean up the Department of Energy facilities prior to building new production facilities," he said.

He said the waste from nuclear weapons plants occasionally finds its way into water sources that supply South Carolina with its drinking water.

Author: Debts prevent Latin America strength

By STEPHEN PANGIONE
Collegian Correspondent

A strong-cultured civil society is the basis of a powerful government, but until Latin American countries are able to deplete their huge foreign debts such strength will elude them, novelist Carlos Fuentes said recently in a lecture at Hampshire College.

Most Latin American countries owe tremendous sums of money to western nations because of their involvements in several wars, resulting in substandard conditions in many nations, Fuentes said.

"The workers didn't borrow the money, but they have to pay for it by poor living conditions," he said.

The democratic governments that have resulted from these battles are positive efforts, but are not likely to be eternal, he said, adding that the "debts are eternal."

A young population boom may offer some hope to Latin America's endangered economies, he said, adding that its population is expected to double that of the United States by the year 2,000.

Peasant migration from rural areas to the cities is also expected to boost the economy by increasing the production of industrialized cities, he said.

"All the jobs in the year 2,000 are already filled by the youth population of today," Fuentes said. "These actions will make Latin America a significant part of the world economy."

Despite his optimism, however, he said there exists a downside to Latin America's future. Fuentes said over half the children born during the 21st century's population boom will already owe $1,000 to foreign governments thereby increasing poverty levels.

"We have gone from a real nation to a legal nation," he said, adding that a country is not "real" if half of its capital is owed to a foreign nation.

The people of Latin America must work for political change and a prospering economy by improving living conditions and increasing self-awareness, Fuentes said.

"We should build houses, strengthen forgotten cities, and build the first road and hospital in a city without one," he said. "It takes society to make decisions, not government.

By improving the conditions of the rural and forgotten areas, they will find their lost traditions of prosperity and strength, he said.

"The citizens will become actors of what concerns them and this is good," Fuentes said. "It takes society to make decisions, not government."

Charity run tomorrow

250 to participate in 10th 'Run for Ritter'

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow morning 250 people will hit the road for kids on the streets.

Organizers of the tenth annual Run for Ritter, scheduled to begin at the University of Massachusetts Alumni Stadium Track, hope to raise $10,000 for homeless shelters across the nation, according to Karen Klemm, co-chairperson of the run.

Elizabeth Pollard, publicity director for the run, said volunteers who sign up to walk or run the 10 kilometer (6.2 mile) course pay a $5 registration fee. Participants are encouraged to seek sponsors for each kilometer they complete. The event is sponsored by the Newman Student Association and, in part, by the Student Government Association.

New SOM program aids minority students

By BETH O'TOOLE
Collegian Correspondent

The School of Management is beginning to see promising results from a program that prepares minority students in the school, according to the program's director.

Minority Management Education, initiated last fall by SOM Dean Thomas O'Brien, is a program to recruit and retain students of color in SOM, according to program director Phyllis Lane.

"The percentage of minority students in SOM is currently 4.4 percent," she said. "We want 10 percent by 1991 and 20 percent by the year 2000."

The School of Management chooses 325 freshman from about 4,000 applications. According to Lane, the MME program ensures that qualified students of color apply for those seats.

"We are interested in providing opportunities and looking at ways in which people can overcome hurdles," she said.

MME's goals include increasing the pool of academically prepared students to SOM, enrolling a larger number of minority students, and retaining already enrolled minority students through graduation, Lane said. MME recruits students through letters and special sessions for minority students, she said, adding that retention is achieved through academic advising, placement activities, and individual counseling.

Lane said the program also tries to work with high school teachers to ensure that students will be prepared for college. One way to accomplish this is through summer programs, when high school students can spend time in college classrooms, she said.

Sophomore Jeannette Sanchez said she learned of the program through the mail. "It has helped me a lot," she said. "They are vey helpful in trying to situate you in a job. If you aren't doing well in class they try to get you a tutor."

Senior Wayne Hosang, a general business and finance major, said the program aided him in his job search. "Phyllis [Lane] gets a lot of information on companies that look for minority students that would help their specific needs, such as language competency."

Hosang said that if a company needs a Japanese-speaking accounting major, for example, "the administration wouldn't know which students speak Japanese, but Phyllis would."

Man arrested on Boston warrant

Police were investigating two vehicles that were stuck in the lawn at the stadium Wednesday when they arrested a 26-year-old Hadley man. He was arrested on an outstanding warrant from the Boston Police Department, according to police.

A second subject will be summonsed after being served a trespass notice and malicious damage notice of property over $250, according to police.

In other police reports:

• A bicycle that was locked in a bike rack in the basement of Mary Lyon was found with both tires slashed and the seat cover cut off, according to police. Damage was valued at $95.

• Two University of Massachusetts women reported that while they were entering a vehicle parked in lot 22, a man exposed himself to them. Police said the man was not identified.

• Police said an accident on Campus Center Way resulted when a vehicle was backing up and hit another vehicle in the process. Damage was estimated at $1,300.

the race will be donated to Father Bruce Ritter, a Catholic minister who runs the Covenant House shelters for homeless and runaway children in New York City, Chicago and Ft. Lauderdale.

"These kids really have no life," Klemm said. "They're just left in the streets. They have no job, so they fall prey to pimps, pornographers and drug dealers. Covenant House serves as a shelter from these types of people."

Pollard said two years ago, the run raised $7,500 while Klemm estimated last year's total at $7,000.

The race is scheduled to start at 9:30 a.m. for walkers, 10 a.m. for runners. Klemm said prospective participants who have not signed up for the run can do so at the track before the run. Pollard said participants will receive free T-shirts and local merchants will provide prizes for the race.

Jennifer Parent, who co-chairs the run with Klemm and Nicole Belhumeur, said this year's $10,000 goal coincides with the tenth anniversary of the run.

"I definitely think we're going to make it. Everybody is really enthused this year," she said.

"We don't have a center for ourselves," she said, adding that existing campus support services are dominated by other minority groups.

"Asian people have nothing and they're the majority [minority]," she said, adding that many prospective University of Massachusetts Asian students seek her help because they feel the services offered by Admissions office will not meet their needs.

"I'm only a student," Lee said, citing the need for increased Asian representatives for the University. "Sometimes people just don't know where to go and they look in a brochure and the pictures aren't of Asian minorities," she said.

The event is free and is sponsored by AASA, the Student Government Association Finance Committee, the Panhellenic Council, the Office of Greek affairs, and others, she said.

Pratip Dastidar, a Southeast Asian, countered: "You think we are so damned foolish that we are going to sit here, listen to your apology and buy it? You can say what you want but we can see right through you."

When Bhogilal asked spectators to raise their hands if they accepted the apology, which many later said seemed sincere, not a single arm was raised.

"I believe a few were sincere but I don't believe they all were," student Owen Broadhurst said, explaining why he refused to accept the apology. "There are a few who want to change the Minuteman, but I do not think they will have any success."

Ueberroth, partners agree to buy Eastern

NEW YORK (AP) — A group led by former baseball commissioner Peter V. Ueberroth has agreed to buy Easter Airlines for about $450 million in a deal that would give the strike-crippled carrier's employees a major share of the company, sources confirmed yesterday.

The deal, which is subject to approval by Eastern creditors and the US Bankruptcy Court, followed lengthy negotiations with Eastern's parent Texas Air Corp.

Eastern scheduled a mid-day news conference in New York to announce the deal, sources close to negotiations said.

Miami-based Eastern has been virtually paralyzed since March 4 by a Machinists union strike that has drawn the support of pilots and flight attendants. Eastern filed for reorganization and protection from creditors in US bankruptcy court in New York on March 9 as its cash dried up.

Ueberroth, who flew to New York late Tuesday night from his California home, began personal negotiations with Texas Air Chairman Frank Lorenzo early Wednesday morning and continued them until about 8 p.m., resuming talks early yesterday.

Ueberroth's group made made a $464 million offer for Eastern last week and them withdrew the bid after being told by Texas Air that it had been topped by another suitor, identified by sources close to the situation as billionaire hotel executive Jay A. Pritzker.

Under the offer accepted by Texas Air, Ueberroth's and Thomas Talbot, a former airline executive from California, would own 30 percent of the airline. Easterns unions would have got another 30 percent of the company in exchange for wage and work-rule concessions. The remaining 40 percent would be held by new investors, including Drexel Burnham Lambert Inc. and Ardshiel Inc., a smaller New York firm.

The group also will receive a minority interest in Texas Air's computer reservations system. The reservation network, System One, is comprised of the former systems of Eastern and continental Airlines, also owned by Texas Air.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individuals writing the editorials and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Glasnost trend continues with youth organizations

People-to-people exchanges with the Soviet Union and the United States have dramatically increased over the past three years. Americans from diverse backgrounds including artists, physicians, educators, and business professionals have shared personal lives and ideas. Recently, 50 university students have attended each other's schools in 1988-89 under a non-governmental consortium of New England colleges. This month, the first high school student exchange brought Soviet students to 10 American host family brothers and sisters will return with the Soviet youth next month to live in Soviet homes and attend Soviet schools.

Craig Vater

In continuation of this growing trend of citizen diplomacy, another first occurred when the Samantha Smith Foundation announced its summer residential youth camp exchange with the Soviet Union's Central Youth Organization. 60 young people, ages 12-15, will arrive in Maine for the month of July, 1989. Sixty American youths will fly to Moscow to be transferred to youth camps located throughout the USSR.

Another first is the establishment of the Worldpeace Camp for Teens, dedicated to Samantha Smith in Poland Spring, Maine. Coincidentally, the property is located two miles from the site of the tragic plane crash which killed Samantha and her father in August, 1985. The Worldpeace Camp will provide the first summer camp that will specialize in building Soviet and American intercommunications. A large delegation of Soviet teenagers will be hosted by Worldpeace Camp from July 8 and August 4 in this international camping community of 150 teenagers and staff.

Samantha was 10 years old when she wrote a letter to Premier Yuri Andropov in 1982. The letter stated that "she was worrying about the Soviet Union and the United States getting into a nuclear war." The Soviet Premier responded that the Soviet people did not want war and invited Samantha to come to the USSR to learn first-hand the views of the Soviet people. The Soviet people responded warmly to Samantha and she came home feeling that these people "were like those in her neighborhood."

Since her death, Samantha's mother, Jane Smith, has been instrumental in setting up the Samantha Smith Foundation, whose primary purpose is to foster youth exchange with the Soviet Union and the United States.

Mrs. Smith, in announcing the formation of the Worldpeace Camp for Teens, indicated that this program and site would form the cennterpiece of her efforts to expand Soviet/American youth exchanges in the camping environment. The Worldpeace Camp for Teens, ages 13-17, will conduct workshops in Soviet Life and culture, conflict resolution, citizen diplomacy, world issues, youth effectiveness training with activities such as waterskiing, sailing, sports, theaterr arts, modern dance, stained glass, fabric arts, photography, guitar, ham radio, chess, and llama trekking. Every effort has been made to integrate the Soviet youth with their accompanying chaperones into the Worldpeace Camp. Campers will find signs on buildings in both Russian and English. Meals in the dining hall that represent both cultures, and a large number of Russian-speaking American staff.

Worldpeace campers will present the hailed Peace Child theater production on August 2, in Lewison, Maine. An audience of 1000 youth participating in the Maine camps will attend the performance. The Soviet-American Cast will be a first in Maine.

Peace Child has been performed more than 500 times in the US and the USSR. China is now being included in this evolving production which was founded by David Woolcombe of Fairfax, Virginia.

The Stagers are conducting informational meeting about the Worldpeace Camp for Teens and the opportunity to go to camp in the Soviet Union this summer. Information about these camp experiences and meetings may be obtained by writing: PO Box 1213, Camden, Maine, 04843.

An exercise in poor judgment

Calling an April Fool's Day issue a "parody", does not excuse offensive characterizations of religious or ethnic minorities. The article "Collegian Editor Abducted, Executed by Muslims" (March 31) goes far beyond the limits of good taste or even sophomoric wit, to the point of gross insensitivity to the deeply felt beliefs of others.

This shameful exercise in poor judgment and religious prejudice has no place at a university with a commitment to tolerance and civil treatment of others.

DC waste reaches epic proportions

I am a worker at the (gasp) Hampshire D.C., writing about those cute little table tents that the food service people put out. You know the ones with the information on how much we irresponsible students waste and how much money it costs. Yes, well anyway, I was wondering how much the D.C.'s themselves waste.

As D.C. employee, I see waste on grand scales. On one given day, I threw out about one hundred dollars worth of food. This may not sound all that bad but you must take into consideration that that was only two meals. Can you imagine the waste in an entire year? Can someone be so incompetent in managing that thousands of dollars could be lost in waste?

Another problem I have with the D.C. is the amount of people on the shift that actually do nothing. There have been times where people were being paid to eat ice cream. Now I don't want to attack students that need the jobs for work study, but on the other hand, I don't want to have to pay more money for increased food costs because people in management are not doing their jobs.

The tragedy when thousands of dreams are lost

Two-thousand aspiring college students had their dreams of college education deferred last semester. Two-thousand qualified individuals, statewide, were denied admission into various state colleges and universities.

"Sorry, you're outta luck," these people were told. "We'd like to let you in [especially because you meet our entrance requirements] but we can't. We can't afford to, because right now we don't even have the money to takie the asbestos our of the ceilings, or fill vacated faculty postitions. Maybe Bob's Citgo is hiring."

Does it dry up like a raisin in the sun?
Or fester like a sore — and then run?

The dreams of many more than two-thousand are now going to be "deferred" at the least, because the State Legislature has firmly committed itself to decimating our Higher Education System.

The dreams of many who are denied admission, though qualified, are going to be worse than deferred. Because for many, a public education is the only one they can afford. The dreams of these people are not being deferred — they're being smashed, trashed, mangled, stomped and ripped into little bite-size pieces.

State colleges and universities should be, are supposed to be, affordable accessible alternatives to private institutions. By denying admittance to qualified students, our higher educational system is failing its primary mission.

William Gorman

It doesn't take a "Lord Jeff" to understand the promise the future holds for those who are denied educations, or to understand the anger and frustration of those denied that dream.

Massachusetts is creating a big runny sore of its higher education system, and the polluted pond pouring out of it is bound to drown the dreams and futures of more than a few.

Does it stink like rotten meat?

Does it ever! The bad stench of carrion is filling the air because the State Legislature tried to trim some "fat" off the educational budget, found it already dangerously malnourished, but went ahead and carved off a few big chunks of throbbing gristle anyway.

The proposed budget butchery is a virtual certainty. After the devastating cuts of the past two years, there is no more fat in higher education. There is only skin, bones, and hair — and not much of that. The legislature is performing liposuction on an anorexic.

Or crust and sugar over — like a syrupy sweet?

Maybe it just sags
like a heavy load.

The dream-killers in our state legislature will be forced to bear a heavy load when this budget goes through. So will the cold-hearted freaks who shriek "No new taxes" like dumb and savage, life-size, wind-up dolls at the mere mention of ruined shortfalls. The load they will bear will be the weight of ruined educational dreams upon their consciences. Can a conscience bear any more than two-thousand dreams deferred — or does it explode?

(Poetry by Langston Hughes.)

Student businesses in danger

You live off-campus, you get out of your 12:20 class and are starving. Where can you go? Earthfoods, the only vegetarian cafe on campus. You're in a dorm, it's late at night and the infamous brownie sundae attack hits. You can run down to any of the various late-night snack bars (Greenough, McNamara, Sweets n' More, or Kennedy's).

What these services have in common, is that they are student-run businesses affiliated with the university. The businesses get a variety of benefits like, no paying rent, utilities, accounting fees, etc. This money comes from the Student Activities Fund (SATF), which is governed by the SGA.

In theory, the system is a great example of a symbiotic relationship — the student businesses provide revenue, which enters the Trust Fund and the SGA through the Trust Fund, which, in turn, subsidizes the student businesses. Because of fiscal problems in the SATF, for the past two years a tax has been levied on all the student businesses.

The SATF tax took 1.2% of all expenditures the first year, then 2.4% and next year, 2.9%. In the fiscal year of 1988, student businesses paid $12,585 back to the Trust Fund in tax, while only taking in $9,184 in profit. Since the tax is a percentage of expenditures not profit, the student-run businesses which lost money were forced to pay additional money in tax. Not even the Federal Government levies taxes on businesses which lose money.

The future appears frightening. The state-wide budget cuts have only worsened the financial situation for the SGA and the SATF. We fear that our "free ride" is coming to an end. Perhaps, next semester, all student businesses will have to start paying rent and utilities. The Student Trust Fund is "killing the goose that lays the golden egg." If the university applies too much financial pressure, it will force all student businesses to fold, digging a deeper hole for the SGA, and the university, which we, the students, have to climb out of.

The SATF must realize the substantial revenue ($554,960) the university stands to lose. Also, student businesses provide hundreds of jobs for students ($131,960 in payroll). The most valuable benefit takes form in the way of services — printing services, note-taking, newspapers, bicycle services to various food services. Above all, student businesses provide an education comparable to a medical internship — a hands-on training.

This affects everybody. Get active. Support student businesses by addressing the SGA. Support UMass and help stop the budget cuts.

Pleasant Street offers relief from summer hype

By ADAM CAMPBELL
Collegian Correspondent

It may be raining outside, but it is unquestionably the dry season in most local movie theaters. Summer is coming, though, so relief is in sight. Actually, it looks to be a particularly interesting summer, with such imminent releases as Batman, License To Kill, the sequels to Back to the Future and Ghostbusters, the new Indiana Jones (. . . and the Last Crusade). Expect a record epidemic of deja vu: summer 1989 will bear a remarkable resemblance to summer 1984, the year which gave us the originals to most of this year's sequel offerings.

For now, though, I've found solace in smaller films, in limited-showcase films that might well go unnoticed amid the fanfare of midsummer mega-hype.

Northampton's Pleasant Street Theatre offers a steady diet of confidently soft-sold cinema. While necessarily varying in degree of quality, the films showcased here rarely disappoint. Pleasant Street is now the only theater which consistently supplies the area with film at all left or right of midstream. The freshness and diversity of the Theater's offerings are what make this jaded moviegoer's life bearable.

Pelle the Conqueror continues its remarkable run at Pleasant Street. It took the Best Foreign Film award at last week's Oscar race. It also dominated last year's New York Film Festival proceedings. The film is beautifully photographed, but Max Von Sydow's performance as the elderly father of young Pelle is the true spectacle. Some viewers may find Pelle's bleakness disheartening, however.

DANCE! That's the cry from New York's Urban Blight, whose r&b, ska, horn-driven music takes over at Ten Below (formerly the Universal Joint), downstairs at Pearl Street tommorrow night at 10 p.m. Cover charge is $7.00.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Vigil has ended its very short run in "the little theater," but I feel it's only right to make some mention of it, even if posthumously. There is a lot of good stuff in this film, but there's also a lot that's not so good. It's about a young girl, twelve or so, who witnesses her father's accidental death. Gradually, she finds her child's-eye point of view inadequate to comprehend the effects of the tragedy on her world. Like Alice in the film Dreamchild, to which The Boston Globe has favorably compared Vigil, she finds herself stranded, alone, in a world of paradox and apparent nonsense. The farmhand keeps 'spirits" in bottles. The tractor is "alive." Mother hates her lover. The old man on the hill has attained a mysterious and rather sinister aura.

The film succeeds in capturing the limited perspective of sheltered youth. It fails, however, in offering any kind of comprehensive statement. While charmed by its innocence and earnestness, the viewer may be left wondering just what it was about, apart from the stock-answer "coming-of-age."

Vigil was replaced this week by The Emperor's Naked Army Marches On. This will play until April 15th.

Rockin' Dave & co. pay the rent with inspired Hatch show

By WILLIAM JAMES
Collegian Correspondent

Rockin' Dave & The Rent Party
The Hatch
March 3

On Monday, April 3rd, the Hatch ceiling opened up and bodies and tables and floors went swimming in the falling stars, drowning in beauty, flailing in wonder and mingling with blood, sweat and joyful tears of sheer satisfaction. What Mick Jagger begged for in his ancient youth, Rockin' Dave delivered. It comes from inside.

Richard Zaft and Brian "Lefty" Harrington kept a more than very steady rhythm on bass and drums respectively, while Rockin' Dave earned his name on a Supra guitar and an accordian (though not at the same time - yet).

A sober Dave, sucking on Mousseys, went through a set that was half covers and half originals. A recently penned song, "Suicide Blues," is for every boy and girl that's been there. Then there's the rap, the blues, the little soul and the zydeco with Rob Skelton jumping up to play washboard, moving from form to form with the natural ease of something that is very naturally easy.

One of the many highlights of the show was another Rockin' Dave original, "Free James Brown," the only contemporary song (with the exception of all The The music) that makes any sense at all. It's a great song that was played a second time because endlessly inspired Friar Ted showed up to do vocals. This added some jumping around, leg splits and real live audience participation (in the Hatch!) that Dave was incapable of with a guitar hanging from his neck. Rockin' Dave expressed the general opinion of Friar Ted with the words, "Friar Ted sounded fucking incredible." By this time everyone had forgotten that the 26 year old Ted was refused admission.

It's time Rockin' Dave got the audience he deserves, which is pretty much everybody. His problem is that he sings from the heart and soul in an age where to "make it" one must sing from the groin or head. But Rockin' Dave has made it. It's just time for you to witness it . . . it comes from the inside.

There's more than one litter problem in your neighborhood.

They never asked to be born. But their mothers' owners figured the local animal shelter would turn to finding them good homes.

They didn't realize that most of the 13.5 million unwanted animals put to death each year are not strays. They're puppies and kittens born in nice homes like yours that have to be killed to make room for more.

Having your pet spayed or neutered is the only way to reduce the sad number of owner less dogs and cats destroyed this year. It will also increase your pet's chances of living a longer and healthier life. That responsibility is yours alone. You'll never stop your pets from acting naturally. But if you love them, you'll have them fixed.

Talk to your veterinarian. Or contact us for a free information packet on birth control for your pet.

TODAY'S HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) A domestic disappointment could be in store. Be flexible. Remain cautious about discussing your dealings with people at a distance. Quiet at-home pursuits are favored tonight. Be affectionate with loved ones.

TAURUS (April 20-June 20) You may be concerned about a family member's health or a business obligation. Things will look brighter later on. Go out and paint the town red tonight. Invite close friends to join you.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Real estate deals look especially lucrative now. However, you may have to deal with a conflict where spending is concerned. Be realistic in your expectations. Share the limelight only with the deserving.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Continue to be prudent in financial affairs to avoid incurring serious mistakes. Comparison shopping will help you make good purchases. Romance thrives on gentle gestures. Plan a special outing.
